PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 102d CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, July 2, 1992

The House met at 10:30 a.m.

Rev. Ronald C. Willis, Southern Baptist minister, Washington, DC, offered the following prayer:

Our Father, all of us who serve and work here do so with a deep sense of our need for divine guidance and direction. And so we ask that You keep us from demanding of others that which we ourselves would be unwilling to give. Keep us from the pride that leads to self-deceit. Give us the strength to do that which transcends our own temporal concerns. Help us to understand that none of this exists without Your will as the guiding force. And most of all, O Holy Father, forgive us when we fail to recognize how much we depend on Your spirit to lead us in the direction that brings justice and righteousness to all our Nation's people. We pray these things, this day. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ZIMMER] will please come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. ZIMMER led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

> I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

SUNDRY MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. McCathran, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1598. An act to continue the authorization of appropriations for the East Court of the National Museum of Natural History;

S. 2566. An act to establish partnerships involving Department of Energy laboratories and educational institutions, industry, and other Federal agencies, for purposes of development and application of technologies critical to national security and scientific and technological competitiveness;

S. 2733. An act to improve the regulation of Government-sponsored enterprises;

S. 2827. An act to amend the John F. Kennedy Center Act (20 U.S.C. 76h et seq.) to provide authorization of appropriations for fiscal years 1993 through 1997 for the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and for other purposes;

S. 2910. An act to authorize appropriations for the American Folklife Center for fiscal years 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, and 1997;

S. 2938. An act to authorize the Architect of the Capitol to acquire certain property; and

S. Con. Res. 129. Concurrent resolution expressing continued support for the Taif Agreement, which brought a negotiated end to the civil war in Lebanon, and for other purposes.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces that it will limit 1-minute requests to five on each side.

THE REVEREND RONALD C. WILLIS

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, since March 1979, Reverend Willis has served on the staff of the District of Columbia Committee and presently holds the position of senior staff associate. During his tenure on the District of Columbia Committee, he has been the principal staff person for legislation transferring St. Elizabeth's Hospital from Federal control to that of the government of the District of Columbia; the 1989 Omnibus Drug Program, which resulted in an increase of 700 additional police officers for the Metropolitan Police Department, as well as eight additional superior court judges; and most recently, legislation which amended the 1973 District of Columbia Home Rule Act to establish a fair and equitable Federal payment formula for determining the annual Federal payment to the District of Columbia.

Prior to his appointment to the District of Columbia Committee staff, Reverend Willis served as adult supervisor for the Southwest Mental Health Care in San Antonio, TX.

Reverend Willis was ordained in 1967 and served as senior pastor of Golden Gate Baptist Church in Oakland, CA; senior pastor of Immanuel Baptist Church, Bangor, ME; and associate pastor of First Baptist Church of San Antonio, TX, which had a membership of 8,900.

IN TRIBUTE OF JUDY ORGANAS

(Mrs. ROUKEMA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, the successes of our communities and our country has always relied on the voluntary contributions of individuals who, in times of need, rise above and beyond the call of duty to make a difference in the lives of others. I pause today to pay tribute to one of the true heroes in the northern New Jersey community, Judy Organas of Garfield. She is a shining example to all of us.

Judy serves as a volunteer at St. Joseph's Hospital in Paterson, NJ. Four hours a day, twice a week, Judy donates her time and energy to provide comfort to the children and infants who, for one reason or another, have found themselves in the pediatric wing of the hospital. Many of these infants have been abandoned by their mothers. Many are victims of the scourges of drugs and AIDS.

Matter set in this typeface indicates words inserted or appended, rather than spoken, by a Member of the House on the floor.

Whether it be a newborn or an ailing child, Judy is there when the family cannot be or, in some cases, when there is no family. She feeds, changes, and gives tender loving care to all. The sterile surroundings of a hospital bed can be a frightening experience for a child, and Judy's compassion eases their pain and provides healing comfort.

Perhaps the best illustration of Judy's ability to make a difference for the children is her relationship with a 3-year-old boy who lives in the hospital's O'Neill Center, a hospice for children with AIDS. Judy has become a source of constant support for the boy and, when he goes for treatments in the hospital, he has learned to depend on her words and kindness to help him through the difficult times.

To date, Judy has donated over 400 hours to the children and has proven an invaluable resource for St. Joseph's. In fact, she was recently recognized by the hospital as their Volunteer of the Year.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said that you give but little when you give of your possessions. It is when you give of yourself that you truly give. By providing an island of stability in the turbulent storm of pain and suffering, Judy Organas gives her all. I ask my colleagues to join in grateful salute for her heroic service.

UNEMPLOYMENT

(Mr. HOYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, today, the 24-month-long recession continues to take its toll on the American people.

In June, 470,000 more Americans joined the unemployment line that now stretches to nearly 10 million. The jobless rate has jumped to 7.8 percent—a full percentage point above what it was last fall when we were assured that we were in recovery—and the highest point since March 1984.

From manufacturing to services, from construction to finance, American workers are being tossed off the job, and our economy continues to suffer.

Mr. Speaker, we must reform unemployment insurance to ensure that workers thrown off the job by this recession can count on having a platform from which they may bounce back, not subject to the political winds of the moment.

More, we need the leadership only a President with an agenda that puts the American people first can provide, to get America back on track and growing again.

UNITED STATES FOOD EXPORTS RESTRICTED IN TAIWAN

(Mr. BEREUTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, for my export 1-minute today, this Member would like to discuss Taiwan's restricted markets to United States food exports.

A few weeks ago, this Member stood here and spoke of the great potential for United States food exports to Southeast Asia. Unfortunately, to the dismay of our Nation's food processors, this potential has yet to be realized.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that excessive tariffs and nontariff barriers have limited these markets to U.S. food products. A representative of a Nebraska food processing company returning from a trip to Taiwan describes a market there, where buyers and consumers wish to buy United States food products, but because of an outrageous 40-percent tariff imposed on our products, they cannot afford them. Our U.S. Trade Representatives confirm this firsthand observation in their 1992 "National Trade Estimate Report on Foreign Trade Barriers." They say, and this Member quotes:

> [In Taiwan] excessively high tariffs remain on most agricultural products despite repeated U.S. requests for their removal or reduction. * * * Processed agricultural products often face import duties of up to 40 to 50 percent ad valorem.

Mr. Speaker, while numerous attempts are under way to protect U.S. industries declining in their competitiveness, there is far too little attention focused on those U.S. industries—like food processing—which remain the most competitive in the world. Therefore, this Member urges his colleagues to press the office of our United States Trade Representatives to intensify its ongoing efforts in Taiwan and elsewhere and to reduce these tariff and nontariff barriers for United States food products abroad. We should also demand that Taiwan, with its huge trade and balance of payment surpluses with this country reduce or remove those tariffs.

CALL FOR A REAL PROGRAM TO END THE RECESSION

(Mr. WISE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, they said the recession was ending, but today we see the figures that the unemployment figures have not gone down; they have gone up to 7.8 percent.

What does that mean in human beings? That means 10 million at least unemployed. It does not talk about the millions more that have given up and are not able to look anymore.

At some point, Mr. Speaker, there has to be some accountability. Where is the jobs program from the White House, a real jobs program? Where is the education program, where is the infrastructure program, where is the trade package? It is not there, Mr. Speaker. And each day, each month on this roller coaster recession where sometimes you are up and sometimes you are down we see what the facts are, that people are not first, and that the economy is just dragging along and not improving. And it is time for a change, Mr. Speaker.

It is time to put people first and to design those programs that put people first. The figures tell the story, but they do not tell it all. The people tell the story, and the people say it is time for some real policies to put real people to real work.

GREATEST ARMS REDUCTION IN HISTORY

(Mr. STEARNS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STEARNS. Mr. Speaker, last week a historic agreement was signed by President Bush and Russian President Boris Yeltsin. This agreement, eliminating intercontinental ballistic missiles and reducing by 50 percent submarine-launched missiles, represents the greatest arms reduction in the history of this great Nation and the world. This will have a far-reaching impact on all our lives, one being the half-century-old fear of nuclear war. This marks an enormous achievement for the administration and President Bush deserves credit for his strong leadership in bringing about this agreement. The geopolitical revolution that took place in the former Soviet Union presented the United States with an opportunity to set a new course for world peace for centuries to come. President Bush's leadership ensured that this opportunity would not pass us by.

The news media and others in this country appear to have lost perspective of what is really important to Americans and their families. With this agreement, the realization of world peace is finally at hand. There is nothing more important in the world than peace and George Bush should be commended for his tireless efforts and contributions toward this goal. I congratulate him and hope that other opinion-makers in this country take time to appreciate this outstanding achievement by our President.

SUPPORT MOTOR VOTER

(Mr. LEWIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it has been reported that President Bush will veto S. 250, the National Voter Registration Act, during the July 4 break. This is an important bill—a bill that would expand voter participation in the political process.

But like a thief in the night, the President wants to steal our best hope for the expansion of American democracy. Without public debate, the President intends to sneak a pocket veto past the American people.

Mr. Speaker, the President can show leadership. He can expand democracy here at home by signing the National Voter Registration Act and opening up the political process. But he does not want to do that. Instead, the President wants to stuff the bill in his pocket. Say nothing. Do nothing. Pocket-veto the bill.

We should not let this veto happen in the dark. The American people need to know.

RTC RECEIVERSHIP CERTIFICATES BILL

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, today the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. ALEX MCMILLAN and I are introducing a bill that would permit the Resolution Trust Corporation to give notes to new depositors in lieu of cash in failing savings and loans. The purpose is to call attention to the fact that Congress has failed to provide additional money to the RTC to close failed thrifts. The result is that some brain-dead institutions continue to collect deposits and pay higher than market rates of interest.

We should have learned that this only serves to dig the hole deeper, a hole that taxpayers will ultimately be asked to fill.

The McMillan bill is a fascinating proposal. This bill will ensure that the hole gets no bigger. Under the gentleman's bill, failed thrifts can be closed immediately, even if the Government does not have the money available to pay off the depositors. Depositors of failed thrifts would receive notes guaranteeing payment of their insured deposits when Congress finally gets around to providing the necessary funding.

This bill is something to think about, Mr. Speaker.

U.S. TRADE POLICY

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, Hughes Aircraft laid off 9,000 workers and American steel companies were forced to go to court themselves to stop this dumping of foreign steel below market prices because our Government will do nothing about it.

But now, California, almost bankrupt, is paying out IOU's to their State workers. Mr. Speaker, what is going on?

While Congress gives 13 billion dollars' worth of foreign aid, and is lining up another $12 billion for Russia, Congress is going to give California tax breaks. Give me a break. I think it is time that Congress realizes that our cities are on fire, our country is going bankrupt, and we might pump up our economy by putting some of this cash going to foreign aid to Russia into America.

PRESIDENT'S MORATORIUM ON REGULATION

(Mr. DOOLITTLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, overregulation is strangling our economy. I support the President's moratorium on regulation. I think that it has highlighted many of the problems that we face.

But the fact of the matter is we have many regulations in force now that need to be repealed. It has been observed that amendments to the Clean Air and Clean Water Act of 1990 could cost this economy as much as $390 billion.

Let me give an illustration of what we are facing with our small cities and our big cities in California. Under one interpretation of the Clean Water Act amendment, these cities are going to have to build completely redundant drainage systems. Now that we have done such a good job of cleaning up pollution, and I commend that, it so happens that rainwater runoff is the most significant source of water pollution in many of our communities today, and therefore, Rocklin, the city where I reside, is going to have to float a bond issue of several million dollars to build a new drainage system to capture rainwater runoff, and contain it in holding ponds so that the water can evaporate rather than run into the creeks, as is presently the case.

This is a perfect example of regulation gone awry, millions of dollars spent to achieve minuscule improvement in the environment.

We need to revise our regulations and reduce them. I commend the President for instituting the moratorium and giving us a chance to focus on the problems of excessive government regulation.

THE LEGACY OF THE TAILHOOK CONVENTION

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, it was not just 26 military women who were embarrassed, demeaned, and even assaulted in the Tailhook Convention at Las Vegas last year. All military women were assaulted and demeaned and embarrassed and, Mr. Speaker, even more so by extension, all women, military and nonmilitary, were assaulted as those 26 were last year.

That event has cost Navy Secretary Garrett his job. It will cause the lack of promotion of several persons responsible for that, and it will hurt the Navy in a collective sense by reason of the bill soon to be brought up by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

But that punishment is not enough, Mr. Speaker. In a positive sense, here should be every effort made by this Congress to be sure American women are not subject to sexual assault in the workplace or outside the workplace. That will be the best legacy of the Tailhook Convention.

APPROPRIATION INCREASES CAUSING FINANCIAL COLLAPSE

(Mr. DUNCAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed a Treasury appropriation bill containing an almost $3 billion increase over last year. This is a 14.5-percent increase in a year that the economy has grown at a rate of between 1 and 2 percent.

We passed a mental health/drug abuse law which has a 46-percent increase over last year.

Now, I want to do everything possible to fight mental illness and drug addiction, but the truth is that if we give every department and agency a 46-percent increase, we will crash economically.

If yesterday was an exception, maybe we would not have a problem, but every week and almost every day we are passing bills authorizing or appropriating huge increases over last year just as if we had surplus cash. We are trying to be all things to all people, and it simply cannot be done.

We have a national debt of $4 trillion. It is strangling our economy. Everyone would be better off if we were not so deeply in debt.

Even worse, we are losing over $1 billion a day on top of this already staggering debt. We will continue to suffer terrible losses until we bring Federal spending under control.

We cannot continue to give every Federal program 10- and 12- and 14- and even 46-percent increases without causing this Nation to collapse financially.

At some point we have to say no. I just hope it is not too late.

FINANCIAL ACCOUNTABILITY AND IMPACT REFORM [FAIR] ACT

(Mr. MORAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Speaker, today marks the beginning of the fiscal year for 46 State and many local governments. These governments have had a grueling year attempting to reconcile declining revenues with new demands on spending that are often imposed by the Federal Government without the corresponding Federal funding. The challenge next year will be no less daunting.

While many of these Federal mandates represent vital public policy objectives, the need for State and local governments to be able to spend local resources on local priorities, however, must also be respected. Only by fully evaluating the economic impact of Federal regulations on State and local governments are policy makers at all levels able to balance priorities for finite resources.

The same is true for the private sector, particularly small businesses. Federal regulation, especially in the areas of worker safety and the environment, is essential. But every dollar spent to comply with additional regulations is a dollar that cannot be spent to produce goods or services or invest in research and development. Clearly there is a need to identify the costs of Federal mandates before they are implemented, so the administration and Congress have the facts they need to make informed decisions.

In response to these concerns, today I am introducing the Financial Accountability and Impact Reform (FAIR) Act of 1992. Like the National Environmental Policy Act, this measure will require Federal agencies to analyze the economic costs of new regulations before they are adopted. And, like the 1974 Budget Reform Act, this measure will require that a bill cannot be considered by the full House or Senate without an analysis of the costs of compliance to State and local governments and to the private sector.

The intent of this legislation is not to impede the legislative or the regulatory process. It is simply to make sure that we as legislators—and the administrators to whom we delegate rulemaking and regulatory responsibility—fully appreciate the financial implications of our decisions before we make them.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCNULTY). According to the Chair's prior announcement, other 1-minute statements will be taken later in the legislative day.

COMMENDING NASA LANGLEY RESEARCH CENTER ON CELEBRATION OF ITS 75TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 324) to commend the NASA Langley Research Center on the celebration of its 75th anniversary on July 17, 1992, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I wanted to give the gentleman from California an opportunity to describe the content of the Senate joint resolution.

I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, the Science Committee rarely brings commemorative resolutions to the floor, but I rise today to recognize the 75th anniversary of the NASA Langley Research Center, which will occur on July 17, 1992.

Mr. Speaker, NASA's Langley Research Center has a long and distinguished history in aeronautics and space research. Indeed, Langley is the country's first civilian aeronautical research laboratory, established in 1917. Since then, Langley has been at the cutting edge of our national aeronautical and aerospace R&D efforts.

For example, Langley was the beginning site of the first U.S. manned space program, Project Mercury. The Nation's original seven astronauts trained there. In more recent years, Langley has managed such major scientific space missions as the Viking Mission to Mars and the lunar orbiter.

I want to commend the men and women of NASA's Langley Research Center and salute them for their many accomplishments to our Nation over the last 75 years.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I would like to commend our colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BATEMAN], who was a leader in pushing this particular resolution in the Congress and brought it to the attention of our committee.

I am glad we are able to get the bill on the floor today.

Langley Research Center does celebrate its 75th anniversary on July 17. It is one of the most honored aerospace facilities in the history not only of this country but the world. It has, in fact, proven to be a major national resource which has had a profound impact on our journey into both air and space.

The people at Langley who work for NASA have invented a lot of new technologies, have provided many practical solutions to aerospace problems, and have developed leaders for the aerospace industry.

So this is an event that deserves recognition.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1917, the country's first civilian aeronautical research laboratory was established in Hampton, VA. Today, that lab, now called the NASA Langley Research Center, is the U.S. Government's oldest, most prolific, and most honored aerospace facility. This national resource has had a profound impact on man's journey into air and space.

NASA Langley helped establish the foundation and infrastructure for aeronautics and space technology in this country. Researchers at the center helped create the tools and train the scientists, engineers, managers, and leaders who have made aerospace history throughout this century.

NASA Langley supports the Nation by studying the basic problems of flight, selecting certain problems for investigation, and developing solutions through long-term research and test programs. As a result, NASA Langley has had a major influence on nearly every aircraft in service.

In addition, NASA Langley supports research in space technology, advanced space transportation systems, and concepts for large space structures. The first U.S. manned space program—Project Mercury—began at Langley, and Langley was the training site for the original seven astronauts. Later, Langley managed such programs as lunar orbiter, which mapped the surface of the Moon for the Apollo landings, and the Viking mission to Mars. NASA Langley is also a major contributor to national atmospheric research.

Occupying almost 800 acres of Government-owned land, the NASA Langley Research Center is comprised of many facilities unique in the world of aerospace research, five of which have been designated national historic landmarks by the Department of the Interior.

For 75 years, the people at NASA Langley have built new research tools, invented new technologies, provided practical solutions to aerospace problems, and developed leaders for the aerospace industry. The center has consistently been a source of technology that has made aerospace a major factor in commerce and national defense.

The Congress of the United States salutes the NASA Langley Research Center as it celebrates its 75th anniversary July 17, 1992. May it continue expanding the frontiers of flight.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

S.J. RES. 324

Whereas, in 1917, the first civilian aeronautical research laboratory of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (NACA) was established in Hampton, Virginia;

Whereas such laboratory, now called the NASA Langley Research Center (hereafter referred to in this Resolution as the "Center"), occupies 787 acres of government-owned land;

Whereas the official groundbreaking ceremonies for the Center were held on July 17, 1917;

Whereas the Center is the United States Government's oldest, most prolific and most honored aerospace laboratory;

Whereas the Center supports the Nation by studying the basic problems of flight, selecting certain of those problems for investigation, and following up with practical solutions to such problems through long-term research and test programs;

Whereas the first United States manned space program, Project Mercury, began at the Center in 1958;

Whereas the Center supports investigations and research in space technology and advanced space transportation systems, designs concepts for large space structures, and develops research hardware and conducts experiments in space;

Whereas the Center makes major contributions to national atmospheric research such as developing satellite experiments, modeling the atmosphere and analyzing climate observations;

Whereas from the beginning, people have been the most important resource of the Center with over 3,000 civil servants and over 2,200 contract personnel university researchers and United States Army helicopter research personnel currently working at NASA Langley;

Whereas the Center is comprised of many facilities unique in the world of aerospeace research, five of which have been designated as National Historic Landmarks by the Department of the Interior; and

Whereas the Center is one of the leading aerospace research laboratories in the world and has consistently been a source of technology that has made aerospace a major factor in commerce and national defense; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress does commend the NASA Langley Research Center as it celebrates its 75th anniversary on July 17, 1992, and as it continues expanding the frontiers of flight.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on Senate Joint Resolution 324, the Senate joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5504, DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1993

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 508 and ask for its immediate consideration.

H. RES. 508

Resolved, That all points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 5504) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993, and for other purposes, for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XXI are waived. During consideration of the bill, all points of order against provisions in the bill for failure to comply with clause 2 or 6 of rule XXI are waived. Points of order under clause 2 of rule XXI against the amendments printed in the report of the Committee on Rules accompanying this resolution are waived. Amendments printed in the report and any amendments thereto shall be debatable for the time specified in the report, equally divided and controlled by the proponent and an opponent.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON], for the purpose of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 508 provides for the consideration of H.R. 5504, the Department of Defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1993.

The resolution waives all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with clauses 2 and 6 of rule XXI, and waives all points of order for failure to comply with clause 7 of rule XXI. Clause 2 of rule XXI prohibits unauthorized appropriations or legislative provisions in general appropriations bills. These waivers are necessary because authorizing legislation for various programs has not yet been enacted.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, clause 6 of rule XXI prohibits reappropriations in general appropriations bills. The clause 6 waivers are necessary to allow the transfer of unexpended balances from one account to another and the extension of authority to obligate those funds in the new fiscal year.

Clause 7 of rule XXI requires the relevant printed hearings and report to be available for 3 days prior to consideration of a general appropriations bill. The clause 7 waiver is necessary to ensure the expeditious consideration of this appropriations bill.

The resolution also waives points of order under clause 2 of rule XXI against three amendments printed in the report to accompany the resolution. The amendments are two to be offered by Representative DORGAN, and an amendment to be offered by Representative PENNY. Each of the three designated amendments shall be debatable for 20 minutes, with the time equally divided and controlled by the proponent and an opponent.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5504 provides appropriations for the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1993. It provides funding for military personnel, operations and maintenance, procurement, and research, development, test and evaluation programs.

We are entering a new era where the United States is the world's only military superpower. Our former adversaries have dismantled their hostile and repressive regimes, and have embarked upon more peaceful pursuits.

At the same time, the world remains a dangerous place. The potential for conflict still exists, as demonstrated by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait last year, and the United States must remain prepared to protect its vital interests.

Consideration of H.R. 5504 will permit us to debate the appropriate level of funding for our national defense needs, and to determine which programs and activities will best enable us to maintain an adequate level of strength to meet potential threats.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5504 addresses two issues that should be of particular interest to this body.

One is funding for the V-22 Osprey. This has been, and remains, a contentious issue between the Congress and the Secretary of Defense. We provided funding for the V-22 in fiscal year 1992 totalling $790 million, but the Secretary has refused to spend the money despite the unmistakably clear intent of Congress to proceed with the program. Recently, the General Accounting Office issued an opinion that the Secretary's action constitutes an unreported rescission in violation of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974.

H.R. 5504 establishes a schedule for the release of both the $790 million provided last year, and the $755 million provided this year. It also requires the Department of Defense to provide Congress with a plan and schedule for completing phase II of the V-22 program.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress has approved legislation providing funds for the V-22, legislation that the President has signed into law. It is time that the Secretary end his withholding of duly appropriated funds and proceed forward with the program as directed by Congress.

Another issue of importance addressed by H.R. 5504 is the issue of defense conversion. Because the world and the assessment of the risks to our national security have changed, expenditures for defense will surely decline for the foreseeable future.

Recognizing this, and the resulting impact on military personnel, defense workers, and our economy, H.R. 5504 also provides funding for defense conversion. I am particularly pleased with this initiative, as I joined with House Armed Services Committee Chairman LES ASPIN and House Majority Leader DICK GEPHARDT in crafting the $1 billion defense conversion package that was added to the defense authorization bill and which is now being funded by this appropriations bill.

We have a golden opportunity to stimulate economic growth and help displaced defense workers and military personnel by redirecting money originally planned for defense. It is a time to be creative and a time to be bold. We have seen an unparalleled defense buildup in the last decade and now, as defense spending is decreased, we must find ways to provide new jobs for the thousands of defense workers who will be out of work and the thousands of active duty military who will no longer be needed by our country.

This resolution will enable us to begin the debate on funding for our national defense, as well as how we can begin addressing the needs of defense workers and our economy as defense spending declines. I urge its adoption.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BATEMAN], a distinguished member of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

I rise in support of the rule now under consideration on the Defense Appropriation bill and anticipate certainly supporting it with my vote and hopefully the passage of the bill.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], the distinguished minority whip, since this piece of legislation does impact on the national employment picture.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from New York, for yielding me this time.

I just want to say that I intend to vote for this today. I think it is very important that we move this bill to the conference and that we continue to support national defense.

I commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE] for the job they have done in putting together a very good bill; but I do think the continuing decline in defense spending and the number of people that we are going to be laying off from defense industries and laying off from the armed services is a further reminder of why it is important for the House and the Senate to pass a strong economic growth bill and to pass a strong incentive program, such as President Bush has sent up, including the $5,000 first-time homebuyers tax credit and the changes in capital gains which would allow us to encourage investment and encourage jobs.

The unemployment number this morning should be a further reminder that until this Congress passes an economic growth program and gets it signed into law and until we pass stimulus to create jobs, we are going to continue to have Americans unemployed.

We have been saying this now since July of last year on the House Republican side. We have tried on several occasions to pass a signable economic growth and jobs bill. I would just hope that the Democratic leadership, looking at this defense bill, looking at the cuts in defense spending, looking at the layoffs in defense industries, looking at the dismissal of both civilian and military personnel from the Pentagon, will come to realize that we must pass an economic growth and jobs-creating program, and we must help President Bush with that kind of program if, in fact, we are going to put the American people back to work and have the kind of world we want.

So, Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague very much for yielding this time. I do intend to vote for this, and I do hope that the entire conference will join us in voting; but I do think as a part of this program with a smaller defense system, we must have more economic growth proposals and more stimulus passed into law.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's points are so well taken.

I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] has a similar interest, and I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to express a concern as the unemployment rate goes up today that the response that we are beginning to hear from the Congress is that this is an excuse for passing the unemployment compensation bill. It is indeed true that we need to provide help for people who are unemployed because of the recession.

On the other hand, it is not a good thing to simply say that keeping people permanently unemployed is the main action this Congress should take. Our real action ought to be to have an economic growth package that puts people back to work, that assures that there are real jobs out there.

This bill today that we have before us that the gentleman brings to the floor with his rule is a bill where we are beginning to cut back on defense. We are cutting back on defense because the world has changed. That is very true, but we had better then figure out how we are going to employ these people in the future. That demands an economic growth package. It demands a commitment to high technology and science and a lot of the kinds of things that stimulate growth for the future.

I do not see that happening in the Congress. The problem is that we are cutting back on our technology. We are cutting back on our science. We are going to protectionism in trade and thereby jeopardizing our exports. We are doing all the wrong things in the Congress right now in order to produce the jobs of the future. I would hope that begins to turn around.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker. I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, that brings me to the point I wanted to make.

Mr. Speaker, I must give my highest commendation to both Chairman MURTHA and ranking member, Mr. MCDADE, of the Appropriations Committee's Subcommittee on Defense for their efforts to bring to the floor a bill that manages—in a responsible manner—the cuts in defense that we will be making as the cold war ends and as we enter a world of new challenges, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] was speaking about before.

Mr. Speaker, I say "responsible" because, although it cuts the Defense Department appropriation a full 17½ billion—not million, but billion dollars from the funding level now in effect—this bill does it in a way that serves to maintain the strength and vitality of our Armed Forces, while largely working with the President toward the goal of reducing those forces by almost 25 percent by the middle of this decade.

Mr. Speaker, let us be clear about something. With the exception of the spending associated with Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm, which, incidentally, was defrayed to a large degree with contributions from our allies—1993 will mark the eighth consecutive year, in spite of all we hear out there in the press, of decline in defense spending in real terms. A lot of members on this floor realize that.

Let us not forget, also, that most of the rescissions we approved earlier this year came out of previously appropriated defense funds, $7.1 billion out of a total of $8.2 billion, to be precise.

Now we have before us a rule that allows the Members to offer amendments to strike funding even further. That concerns me a little bit, but as much as I may believe that we need to be cautious in considering such further cuts—for the sake of our men and women in uniform who will be separated from their careers in the service, and for the sake of the men and women in our economy who work in our defense industrial base—I support this rule for giving Members that right. That is fair.

Mr. Speaker, let me take a moment to state my concerns—not about this rule, but about the process by which we are granting rules for debate and amendment, not just on appropriations bills, but on authorizing bills as well.

Lately, we seem to have forgotten that we are here not just to enact legislation on the floor of this House, but to give the Members adequate time to educate themselves on the contents of the legislation being reported by various committees prior to floor debate. That is terribly important.

Quite frankly, the Rules Committee has gotten into the disturbing habit of holding hearings on bills and then reporting rules for their consideration before the Members—and that is 99 percent of the Members of this House—at large have had a chance to study the committee reports, in fact, in some cases, well before such reports are even printed for the use of the Members. Members cannot even see the report. They do not know what is in the bill.

This is not good, Mr. Speaker, and can only lead to the kind of confusion that we saw so recently in the Rules Committee on the Interior appropriations bill, when so many Members appeared before the committee on short notice to express their concerns about its provisions—after which the initial rule reported by the committee was quickly withdrawn once other Members were able to focus their attention on it and the provisions of the bill it covered. That is why the bill was pulled from the floor and does not even appear on the Calendar for next week again.

Mr. Speaker, although this procedure by the Rules Committee is not a violation of the standing rule that calls for a bill and committee report to be available for at least 3 days before debate on the floor, it certainly violates that rule's spirit, in my estimation. And I can only hope that the majority will not continue to engage in such fast-track procedures, which often leave the membership confused—and perhaps even resentful.

Having said all this, Mr. Speaker, I want to return to my main point, which is that I support this rule and expect that its adoption will help us pass this important bill that Chairman MURTHA and ranking member, Mr. MCDADE, have brought to this floor, so that the other body can proceed to its consideration. It is a good piece of legislation and I hope every Member votes for this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, if I may direct a brief question to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. Chairman, the defense authorization bill passed by the House several weeks ago included $1 billion of defense conversion. That authorization bill, of course, must now go to conference with the other body. It is my understanding that once the House and Senate reach agreement on the authorization bill in conference, and specify exactly how that $1 billion will be spent—that it is the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—it would be his intention in the conference version of his appropriations bill, to track those provisions that would be agreed upon by the Senate and the House in the authorization bill.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FROST. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is exactly right. Because we did not know all the details about it when it was originally introduced, we will fund whatever the Committee on Armed Services authorizes.

Mr. FROST. I appreciate that because that is a very important provision that Chairman ASPIN, majority leader GEPHARDT, and I, and a number of other Members worked on, and it is very important that it actually be funded once it is agreed upon by the conferees on the authorization side.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, this is a good rule and I would ask the Members to vote for it.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill (H.R. 5504) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993, and for other purposes, and that I may be permitted to include tables and other extraneous material.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1993

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5504) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to not to exceed 1 hour, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE] and myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 5504, with Mr. OBERSTAR in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill is considered as having been read the first time.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I bring to the House of Representatives the fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill. I'd like to thank all the members of the Defense Subcommittee for the hard work they have performed all year. I'd like to give special thanks to the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE]. I am sad to mention that this is the last time the Defense appropriations bill will be on the floor with the assistance of Congressman DWYER and Congressman AUCOIN. They are both leaving the House and their counsel will be greatly missed.

The Appropriations Committee is recommending to the House a total of $252.7 billion in the new budget authority for fiscal year 1993 for the Defense Department. This figure is $8.6 billion below the budget request and $17.4 billion below the current year funding level. These spending levels do not include funds for the Nuclear Weapons Program of the Department of Energy or for military construction. Those activities are funded in separate appropriations bills.

At this point in the RECORD I will insert a table outlining the committee's recommendations by account:

DEFICIT REDUCTION

In this bill, and in the recently passed rescission bill, the committee has made an important contribution to deficit reduction. The rescission bill included a total of $7.1 billion of previously appropriated defense funds which were rescinded. The committee has reduced this bill $8.6 billion below the budget request. Thus the recently passed rescission bill and the fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill have made an important contribution to current and outyear deficit reduction.

DEMISE OF THE COLD WAR

The steadfastness and rightness of America's foreign policy and defense posture since the end of World War II have paid dramatic and stunning results in recent years:

The collapse of the Berlin Wall;

The dissolution of the former Soviet Union and its empire.

The emergency of democracy in eastern Europe and in the former Soviet Union.

The dramatic decline in the actual and projected number of nuclear warheads in the strategic arsenals of the United States and the former Soviet Union.

The Congress should be proud of its steadfast support for a strong U.S. military over the decades of the historical struggle between the forces of democracy and its adversaries. Clearly, as America enters victorious into the post cold war era, it is appropriate to significantly downsize the Defense budget and DOD's force structure. What is not appreciated by many, is the significant degree to which that downsizing has either already taken place or is projected to take the place in the outyears.

DECLINE IN DEFENSE SPENDING

Not including the one-time spike upward for Desert Shield/Desert Storm related expenditures, the fiscal year 1993 budget authority for defense represents the eighth consecutive year of decline in defense spending when measured in constant dollars. Also, additional reductions assumed in the outyear projections in defense are quite large:

U.S. military operations will be ended, reduced or placed on standby at 559 overseas installations.

The projected contraction in the force structure, when implemented over the next few years, will result in a force structure at lease 25 percent below the force structure that existed in 1990.

A reduction in the U.S. base structure roughly commensurate with the 25-percent reduction in the force structure either has been announced or will soon be recommended.

Budget authority in constant fiscal year 1993 dollars

Fiscal year:	Procurement
	Procurement
1985	127.2
1986	117.7
1988	94.7
1990	89.7
1991	76.5
1992	62.5

The procurement account has declined by almost 60 percent in the past 8 years.

In a few years, the DOD's budget will be a smaller percent of the Federal budget and of the gross domestic product, than it has been since before World War II.

Thus in historical perspective and in perspective of the Nations total wealth, the level of defense spending recommended in this bill is indeed modest.

STRATEGIC NUCLEAR ARSENALS

Based on the recent talks between Presidents Bush and Yeltsin, the combined strategic nuclear warhead arsenal of the United States and Russia are projected to decline to a level of approximately 7,000. This is a reduction of about two-thirds from the current level. The latest proposal for reducing the U.S. arsenal will be embodied in a future treaty proposal which will be submitted to the Senate for ratifications.

In terms of procurement funds in this bill for strategic weapon systems, there basically is $3.5 billion which consists of $2.7 billion for the B-2 bomber and $787 million for procurement of D-5 missile for the Trident submarine. Thus, just over 1 percent of this budget is for procurement of strategic weapon systems. Additionally, it should be noted that the B-2 Stealth bomber is also a weapon system designed for conventional warfare.

Additional funds are included in the military personnel and operation and maintenance accounts for maintaining various strategic systems. As ratified treaties are implemented, these funds are sealed back.

PRIORITIES IN THIS BILL

As the nature of the threat to America's national security changes, we must be perceptive enough and wise enough to invest our resources in the right mix of defense systems and force structure to meet the evolving global situation in an era of greatly reduced defense budgets.

The broad trends in defense budgets of the past few years, and the probable trends of the next few budgets are threefold.

A dramatic reduction in strategic and tactical nuclear warheads;

While the world in general is much safer as a result of the past few years, history takes many strange twists and turns. The committee believes that in this era of a downsized military, with a significantly lower presence overseas, the central aspects of readiness include deployability, mobility, sustainability, and lethality. The committee has made funding adjustments to numerous programs to enhance these important aspects of readiness.

HIGHLIGHTS OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Chairman, I would like to briefly highlight the committee's recommendation in the major accounts.

ACTIVE MILITARY PERSONNEL

The committee recommends a total of $76,896,200,000 for military personnel, a decrease of $184,000,000 from the budget request.

The committee agrees with the authorized end strength as in the President's budget request but took an additional decrease of 10,000 end strength in both Army and Navy appropriations for a total reduction of 20,000 to be applied to administrative and management positions at departmental and major command headquarters, and not from troops in the field.

Reductions should come from positions in the national capital region, wherever possible.

GUARD AND RESERVE

The committee recommends a total of $9,436,500,000, an increase of $240,000,000 above the budget request for personnel. In addition, the committee recommends a total of $8,284,519,000 which includes funding in the real property maintenance appropriation. This is an increase of $309,400,000 above the budget request for operation and maintenance.

The committee agrees with the authorized end strength for the Marine Corps Reserve, Air Force Reserve, Army National Guard, and added an additional 10,000 end strength above the budget request for both the Army Reserve and Navy Reserve.

OPERATION AND MAINTENANCE

The operation and maintenance appropriation provides the resources necessary to maintain high readiness of our Armed Forces and to enhance the quality of life of our military personnel, their families, and civilian personnel. The committee recommends a total O&M funding level of $71,710,202,000, a decrease of $3,121,974,000 from the budget request.

Although the recommended funding level is significantly lower than the budget request, the committee's actions shall not affect the readiness of our Armed Forces. The reductions are from administrative and management accounts and funds that pay for foreign national employees and repairs and maintenance of overseas facilities.

The committee denied the Department's budget request to transfer $2,000,000,000 of excess cash from the Defense business operations fund [DBOF] to the services' O&M appropriations. Instead, the committee directed the Department to free issue supply items from DBOF to the services in order to reduce DOD's multibillion-dollar excess inventories, and to force the Department to provide the necessary controls and accountability of the cash balances in the Defense business operations fund.

The committee provided an additional $250 million to repair and modernize troop billets, armories, and training facilities.

PROCUREMENT

The committee recommends $53,743,289,000 in new obligational authority and $1,900,000,000 in transfers for procurement items. Major programs funded in the bill include the following:

RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION

The committee recommends $38,795,148,000 for the RDT&E title, a reduction of $126,055,000 from the budget request. Specific recommendations of selected programs are as follows:

The committee provided $443,007,000, the budget request, for the Comanche light armed scout helicopter. In addition, the committee added $25,000,000 for Apache upgrades and $8,100,000 for OH–58D upgrades.

The committee provided $408,444,000 for armored systems modernization, a reduction of $35,000,000. In addition, the committee added $31,800,000 for Bradley upgrades and $26,800,000 for M1 live fire testing/fielding. These actions reflect the amount approved by the House of Representatives during consideration of H.R. 5006, the National Defense Authorization Act, 1993.

The committee provided $1,136,589,000, the budget request, for the new model F–18E/F, and $165,583,000, the budget request, for the AX, with no legislative requirements on prototyping as was suggested by the House Armed Services Committee. Also, the committee provided an increase of $50,000,000 to give the Navy the option of developing the F–14 Quickstrike air-to-ground attack version of the aircraft.

The committee provided $150,000,000 in the submarine and combat system development programs to continue development and testing of the SSN–21 Seawolf.

The committee provided $193,408,000, an increase of $33,000,000, to ship self-defense, in order to continue and augment the committee initiative to provide advanced protection to Navy surface ships from sea-skimming, antiship cruise missile attacks.

The committee provided $162,473,000, an increase of $127,000,000, to the P–3 modernization program—$90,000,000 for the development of an advanced propulsion system which will be needed for the next model of the aircraft, and $37,000,000 for the further development and testing of the Update IV avionics system.

The committee provided $775,000,000 for the V–22 program to continue construction of production-representative aircraft for testing purposes. This reflects the amount approved by the House of Representatives during consideration of H.R. 5006, the National Defense Authorization Act, 1993.

The committee provided $1,261,384,000, the budget request, for the B–2 advanced technology bomber.

The committee provided $2,024,268,000 for the F–22 advanced tactical fighter, a reduction of $200,000,000. This action reflects the amount approved by the House of Representatives during consideration of H.R. 5006, the National Defense Authorization Act, 1993.

The committee provided $175,489,000, the budget request, for the National Aerospace Plane Technology Program.

The committee provided $210,000,000, the budget request, for the C–17 program.

The committee provided $4,237,500,000 for the strategic defense initiative and theater missile defense programs, and encouraged the Navy to accelerate theater defense applications.

The committee provided $362,957,000 for the Defense Nuclear Agency, a reduction of $47,000,000.

The committee provided $100,000,000 for the high definition military displays technology program, which has potential dual-use spinoffs.

The committee provided an additional $180,000,000 for advanced materials research.

The committee provided an additional $20,000,000 for Sematech.

NAVAL AVIATION

Mr. Chairman, the future of naval aviation has been and continues to be one of the most difficult funding and policy issues we face. Because of the importance of this issue, I would like to take a few minutes to explain this issue to the House.

With the demise of A–12 and the cancellation of F–14 upgrades by DOD, the state of naval aviation is a real problem that we must fix. The House Armed Services Committee made a number of very thoughtful proposals on the A–X and new model F–18E aircraft development programs, which our committee strongly considered. But in the end, we could not agree with them. The committee essentially approved the administration's plan, but with a few strings attached.

Concerning the F–18E/F, the committee approved $1.1 billion as requested. The HASC would have required an extensive prototyping phase, and delayed entry of the program into the engineering/manufacturing development phase until 1996. This would have delayed introduction of the aircraft into the fleet by at least 3 years. Since 90 percent of the avionics and software are unchanged in the new model F–18E/F, and the program requires that the first seven preproduction aircraft fly 55 months of testing time, we agree with the Office of the Secretary of Defense that the program is low to moderate risk. In addition, the Congress did not require such prototyping when the Air Force developed its new model F–15E, which was very successfully used in Iraq. However, the committee cautioned the Navy that our support will remain only as long as technical risks remain low to moderate, and that the cost and schedule commitments made to Congress are kept. Concerning A–X, the HASC suggested accelerating the program and requiring two industry teams to perform the 4-year demonstration/validation phase. Our committee would also like to accelerate A–X, but the Navy's program is already shorter than the Air Force's ATF; we don't want to cause another A–12. We also share the HASC's concern about down-selecting to a single contractor, based only on paper analysis. But, it is not clear whether legislatively requiring two industry teams makes sense: It clearly does if the Navy chooses to build a new aircraft; it clearly does not if the Navy chooses an advanced tactical fighter variant. This is important because the Navy says carrying an extra industry team costs an additional $2 billion. We believe that DOD needs time to conduct its normal acquisition process, because the final strategy and decisions will be made at the Secretary of Defense level. Our committee approved the Navy's budget request of $165 million, but requires OSD to report its A–X decision to Congress 30 days in advance of signing any contracts. This gives Congress time to review DOD's decision next spring, and to introduce legislation next year should that be necessary.

Concerning the F–14, the committee provided $50 million for the Quickstrike package to provide air-to-ground capabilities to the F–14 aircraft. We view this as a low-cost option that the Navy could pursue if it chooses, for retrofit into the existing fleet.

INTELLIGENCE

Mr. Chairman, during the course of the last decade, budgetary resources devoted to the intelligence community have grown in real terms by over 100 percent. Over the same time period, the overall defense budget—excluding the intelligence budget which is contained within the defense budget—grew by only 5 percent in real terms. In addition, the level of intelligence personnel in the National Capital region has grown 70 percent over the same time period.

Accordingly, the committee has recommended reductions to the intelligence budget and has included section 9128 in the general provisions of this act, mandating a reduction of 2 percent to the National Foreign Intelligence Program [NFIP] personnel levels when compared to fiscal year 1992 levels. The committee also directed that the Director of Central Intelligence [DCI] submit a plan to the Committee on Appropriations which details how NFIP personnel levels, including those in the National Capital region, will be reduced by 2 percent a year over the following 5 fiscal years.

The committee believes that reductions to the intelligence budget can be accomplished in a manner which retains a robust capability to address the most crucial security issues which affect the country. The committee is also prepared to work closely with the Defense Department and the intelligence community in this endeavor.

LTV ACQUISITION

The committee bill includes a general provision which prohibits the acquisition of the LTV Aerospace and Defense Co. by the French company Thompson CSF. The provision also prohibits use of funds in the act to further this sale. The committee believes that such an acquisition would not be in the national security interests of the United States. This belief is based in part on the aggressive international marketing of defense hardware and technology by Thompson CSF and by the French Government, generally. For example, Thompson CSF is said to be responsible for selling the sophisticated air defense system to Iraq which our pilots had to counter in Desert Storm.

The committee's concern about the LTV acquisition is supported by a recent study by the Defense Intelligence Agency which concluded that the sale would represent a significant risk to the U.S. technology base. Furthermore, in a recent article, the former head of the French intelligence service is quoted as saying that, "In technological competition, we are competitors, we are not allied." In this time of defense drawdown, it is not prudent to sell our leading edge technological capabilities to foreign countries.

TAILHOOK INCIDENT

As many of you may know, I served over three decades in the Marine Corps including active duty and Reserves. I am very proud of those years of service and I'm proud of the magnificent job the men and women of our Armed Forces have performed in the service of this country over the years. For many years, the Defense Department has been in the forefront in implementing progressive social policies. The Armed Forces are the most thoroughly integrated institution in our society. An aggressive policy of racial equality for members of the armed services was first implemented under President Truman. Also, over the past few decades, the role of women in the armed services has increased dramatically.

Thus it was with particular anger and disgust that I learned of the Tailhook incident last year. I have been equally dismayed by the snail pace of the investigation. The unconscionable behavior of the officers at the Tailhook convention is a severe blight on the reputation of the Navy. An investigation must be aggressively pursued to determine who participated in this illegal and immoral behavior, and all guilty parties appropriately punished.

I have communicated to the Secretary of the Navy and top naval officers in the past on my concerns about sexual harassment in the Navy. This behavior by Navy personnel will simply not be tolerated.

OTHER PROGRAMS

I would like to briefly address some other initiatives we have taken in this bill:

The committee has included $1 billion for economic conversion to assist communities adversely impacted by the significant slowdown in military spending.

We have added funds to the Army Guard and the Air National Guard for the funding of 12 pilot youth programs—6 for urban programs and 6 for the Youth Conservation Corps. The Guard personnel will provide instruction, counseling, and mentoring at these camps.

We have funded a pilot program in the Army Junior ROTC program to enhance the opportunities for minority participants to enter higher education.

The committee has added $109 million above the budget request for medical R&D including:

AIDS research: +$33,000,000.

Breast cancer research: +$25,000,0000.

Bone marrow research: +$31,000,000.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, this bill is:

Below the budget request;

Below the level for defense in the budget resolution;

Makes an important contribution to deficit reduction.

This bill:

Basically funds all major programs requested;

Adds significant funds for the Guard and Reserve;

Continues the steady contraction of the overall force structure and base structure as noted by a funding level $17.4 billion below the current fiscal year;

Reorders priorities somewhat and emphasizes: deployability; mobility; and sustainability.

I urge support for this bill and passage by the House.

I understand Mr. PENNY will offer an amendment later to delete procurement funds for the Trident II—D-5—missile. I will oppose this amendment but, as the threat changes and declines, this issue will have to be reviewed and further evaluated as other programs will have to be reviewed.

Also I understand Mr. UPTON has a concern about the Meals Ready To Eat Program.

It is the intent of the committee to support the budget request to purchase 2.8 million cases of Meals Ready To Eat [MRE]. It is my understanding that the Department could require an annual purchase of 3.1 million cases for future contingencies and humanitarian assistance for worldwide emergencies. I shall certainly support additional purchases of MRE's for these purposes, if required, but the Department is not mandated to make these purchases.

Mr. Chairman, with that I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to rise in support of this bill. It has the usual problems. There are areas of disagreement with the administration, there are areas of disagreement among ourselves, but it is generally a good bill. There is one very major problem, and that is the abortion language that is in it. It would result in a veto. I hope, as we move along to conference, we can remove that and get the bill signed into law.

I have a statement from the administration that supports that approach and says they would like to see it proceed to conference and try to rework some of the numbers. I do not know whether we can get every piece of objectionable language out, but, I certainly want to try.

Mr. Chairman, I want to express my deep gratitude to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], the chairman of this subcommittee. It has been my privilege to be a Member of this body for 30 years, and I know of no Member in my 30 years' experience who does a more outstanding job to shepherd the welfare of the men and women of the armed services as does my friend from Pennsylvania.

I congratulate him for his work on this bill, and for his work as a Member of the House. He is a credit to all of us. I thank him for his leadership.

I want to say the same about the members of the subcommittee. We have wonderful people who work together. We have a superb staff and they have spent countless hours on this bill.

Let me just say as a Member on this side of the aisle who is charged with this enormous responsibility, that if I were to have my finest wishes come true, I could not ask to have better people to serve with me than the gentleman from Florida [Mr. YOUNG], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MILLER], the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON], and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS]. They are true patriots, and they are wonderful people.

Mr. Chairman, this bill reflects a bipartisan effort by the committee, to take yet one more step in the Nation's effort to reshape and downsize our defenses in this time of great change.

In so doing, we have also been able to make a major contribution toward what is clearly our most pressing domestic need—reducing the deficit.

For example, compared to the fiscal 1992 bill, this bill represents a reduction of over $17 billion. Adjusted for inflation this is a 1-year cut of about 10 percent.

We have scrubbed the budget request thoroughly, and as a result we recommended a reduction of more than $8½ billion from the request. And we've come in substantially lower than our 602 allocation in both budget authority and outlays.

In terms of specific issues, I want to stress that we have followed the lead of the House, as expressed last month on the Defense authorization, on major policy questions. This includes the SDI program, the B-2 bomber, and others.

Now, we are hearing that Members may try to revisit some of these issues today. I can only say that these areas have already been debated at length and voted by the House. I see no reason why the membership should have to go through this all over again on this bill and so I would urge restraint here.

Mr. Chairman, I am not completely pleased with all the recommendations we bring forth today, nor is the administration. In some areas we have gone too far in terms of the cuts in this bill.

And I am personally distressed regarding a cleverly crafted amendment, adopted without prior notice in the fill committee, concerning abortion at overseas military facilities. That provision was adopted last month on the authorization; now, here it appears on an appropriations bill, where it does not belong in terms of jurisdiction, let alone substance.

This provision is opposed by many Members, on both sides. But I am a realist, Mr. Chairman, and I realize there is nothing we can do today to change the position of the House on this.

But one thing is certain: if this provision comes back from conference I will oppose the bill, and if it is in a bill sent to the President we will see a veto. No question.

In the end, for this bill to ultimately become law, this provision, along with other areas of concern to the President will have to be corrected.

That is nothing new for us, with the Defense appropriations bill. That has been the case each of the 8 years I've been privileged to manage this bill as it has come to the House.

We need to fix these problems, both on the authorization and here as well, but that will have to wait until conference.

So, Mr. Chairman, with that caveat, I would urge Members, on both sides, to support this bill. Keep the process moving forward, and give your support to a measure which does many, many good things with respect to the Nation's security, and for our young people who serve so resolutely each and every day on the front lines of freedom.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of the bill, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DICKS].

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of H.R. 5504 and want to commend the chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] and the ranking member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE].

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5504, the Defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1993. I congratulate Chairman MURTHA for his unequivocal leadership and cooperative approach to a very important issue that we face today. I commend the ranking member, Mr. McDADE, as well as all of my colleagues on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee for bringing to this House, a bill that addresses our national security requirements despite the fiscal constraints and emerging world developments. I also want to thank the staff of the subcommittee for their professional support and the long hours they labored to make this bill possible.

In H.R. 5504, the committee has recommended $252.7 billion in new budget authority, a reduction of $8.6 billion below that of the fiscal year 1993 budget. This is a reduction of $17 billion below that which was appropriated in fiscal year 1992. This represents the eighth consecutive year of decline in Defense spending when measured in constant dollars. The procurement account alone, for defense weapons systems has declined by nearly 60 percent over this period of time. Considering the new world realities and our own budgetary constraints, this is a significant reduction in defense spending, Mr. Chairman, and a significant contribution towards deficit reduction.

Mr. President, 1 year ago this weekend, America celebrated our Independence Day, reaffirming our pride in the military success of Operation Desert Storm. Now, just 1 year later, we have witnessed even more dramatic events in the world. While we are no longer worried about a surprise attack by the former Soviet Union, the world is still a very uncertain place and we are faced with challenges and events that will continue to shape our national security policy for the years to come. While world events almost certainly justify overall reductions in spending, we must continue to maintain our responsibilities and interests around the world. The committee has supported the proposed reductions in defense spending as consistent with our legitimate security requirements. The Department of Defense budget plans to reduce its spending 25 percent after inflation adjustments over the next 5 years, trimming the Nation's defense budget outlays to nearly 3.4 percent of the GNP—the lowest level since before World War II. These moves must be carefully executed so that we maintain a credible military force and not place our security in jeopardy.

And still, more and more people cry for larger defense cuts. There may be some additional cuts that could be taken, as suggested by Congressman ASPIN, and Senator NUNN. This will be particularly true as we strive to achieve a balanced budget and meet pressing domestic needs. But those who call for more rapid draconian cuts are, in my judgment, asking us to retreat from active participation in world events that ultimately could adversely impact our vital security interests. The bill this committee offers today, is a real reduction in defense spending, with the crucial goal to support a smaller overall military; ready, well trained, and equipped, to meet future threats and missions. The transition to a smaller Armed Forces will not be a painless task. The defense industrial base, which for years has produced the kinds of specialized weapons systems that gave us the superior military technology and capability unmatched any where in the world, are being terminated, and shutdown. Domestic and overseas bases continue to close. By the end of this year fiscal year 1992, 300,000 men and women will have left the military service of their country, and over 100,000 civilians will leave military employment. As a result of these reductions, large numbers of employees are being involuntarily separated. Combined with the mandated reductions in military personnel levels, I am very concerned with the amount of people that are being forced into the current economy that is unable to accept them. The committee has supported the need for better requirements to ease these hardships, and that Federal civilian employees be given the same level of attention that is being given to uniformed personnel and private sector contractor employees. In response to these concerns, this bill includes $1 billion for a comprehensive economic conversion program to provide retraining and placement assistance to workers dislocated as a result of defense cuts along with funding innovative technology programs with potential commercial applications that can utilize the skilled personnel no longer needed by the military.

In the past, our Nation has not demobilized as sensibly as needed. We continue to face uncertain threats, that will require new and different strategies and military structures. This past December, we marked the 50th anniversary of Pearl Harbor, Mr. Speaker; Americans still remember the horrible cost of being unprepared. As we reflect back on Desert Storm, time and time again has the observation been made that only because we had nearly 56 months to deploy and supply our forces, were we able to defeat Saddam Hussein. The committee has focused its priorities on maintaining the quality of our troops, their training, readiness, and flexibility. Reaction response time becomes even more important as the world's adversaries become more difficult to detect. We are reducing our forward deployed troops, closing more than 500 overseas bases. Relieving that forward logistics disadvantage is addressed in the committee's support for the vital sealift and airlift assets for necessary for quick response, including the V–22, as well as the prepositioning of equipment and supplies. Combined with quick lift, light and heavy divisions, equipment, and supplies will be transferred to all parts of the world.

Future threats, as well as the budgetary constraints we face, will influence what weapon system capabilities will be required. As we restructure our defensive capabilities, the first priority would be the ability to deliver significant ordnance over long distances with little warning or advanced basing. I remain convinced that 20 B–2's offer revolutionary conventional capabilities for this requirement. As we reexamine our positions in light of the need for smaller contingency forces, the B–2, with smart weapons and worldwide reach, is exactly the kind of weapon we need for the future. Since the beginning of the cold war, we have relied upon the use of nuclear weapons as the deterrence. We learned very early on that nuclear weapons could provide deterrence more effectively than conventional means. Now the world has changed, and containment of the nuclear weapons is becoming a cooperative effort, worldwide. The focus is shifting to one of nonproliferation, arms control, and the deterrence role now becomes one of conventional means. The B–2, in its conventional role, is our greatest source of deterrence.

Efforts for arms control nonproliferation continue to grow. Unrestricted arms sales of weapons and parts can no longer be tolerated. Actions are necessary to prevent unauthorized sales and enact restraints preventing rogue countries from gaining and using the nuclear technological capabilities against others. Dismantlement of such an arsenal is imperative. Funds were previously authorized in support of the Nuclear Threat Reduction Act of 1992, for nonproliferation projects. The committee shares my deep concern with the lack of operational safety of the civilian nuclear reactor facilities in the Republics. We have earmarked $50 million of these funds to implement the Multilateral Nuclear Safety Initiative, which establishes two regional training centers to serve as focal points for operational safety, risk reduction measures for the unsafe nuclear reactors, as well as assists in developing effective safety standards and procedures.

In the health care arena, it has been the goal of this committee to fund health care programs that will improve access to military medical facilities for the military beneficiaries and retirees, while concurrently controlling the high costs for both the beneficiaries and the Government. The members of this committee have vocalized their support of better, more thorough health care for the military, their families, and the uniformed retirees. These people deserve better care, and it has become the consensus that the Department of Defense has not and is not taking care of its own. This committee encourages the expansion of programs such as the CHAMPUS reform initiative, which has shown great promise for delivering quality care nationwide.

The committee recognized the need to identify weapons systems programs that are no longer needed, or can be reviewed and consolidated. The committee has terminated funding for the antisatellite program; there is a reduction of $1.1 billion from the funds requested for the strategic defense initiative; there are reductions to a great number of servicewide classified programs; procurement in general, was reduced 60 percent, and there were also reductions to research and development. As the committee reports, these reductions totaled $8.6 billion, without sacrificing the quality of life for our service men and women, and without sacrificing our superior military readiness and capability.

Finally, the committee recognizes that the environmental cleanup of our defense bases is a growing problem. Serious problems have been documented in the implementation of the defense environmental restoration program that have consistently delayed completion of remedial action and have resulted in wasted expenditures. This committee has reiterated this problem in this bill, and provided $900 million for environmental cleanup activities at our military installations, along with direction to curtail the study activities and accelerate actual remediation. The committee has conveyed its desire to work with the Department to improve this situation, and has endorsed the pilot program for an expedited environmental restoration recently authorized in H.R. 5006.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5504, the Defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1993.

I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE], and all my other Appropriations Committee colleagues on the Defense Subcommittee for the great job in putting this bill together. Along with the military construction appropriations bill, this bill provides a large measure of support to our National Guard and Reserve components. These components place a vital role in our national security.

As I have stated before, all of the National Guard and the Reserve components have a tremendous peacetime mission and because they are local, they play a big part in adding to the support of the regular services.

This is not understood by many. Every time the Guard is called up, local areas see their military dollars being spent on something important to the areas—and that feeling carries on to the whole military. We need to continue to provide support to the Guard and Reserve for all of these reasons.

As we continue our unprecedented reductions in our voluntary military, a program is needed to ensure that the transition for our military personnel into the civilian sector be as smooth as possible so that troop reductions do not produce undue hardships on either the personnel being displaced or on those areas of our country where facilities are located.

The Defense Reinvestment for Economic Growth Program could be very important in this regard. We should use this program to give attention to using existing defense resources to restore the condition of our roads, our bridges, our highways, harbors, waterway locks and dams, schools, hospitals, and other public facilities. The need for these facilities has been well documented. Programs developed to provide for this asset investment not only provide employment opportunities which help the economy, but the facilities themselves provide benefits and growth for the Nation as they are put to their intended use. The Defense Reinvestment for Economic Growth Program needs to be developed to phase in with the military build-down and to create productive employment for those crowded out of military production and those who are forced to retire from the military or contractors after devoting their time to the defense of our country.

Mr. Chairman, this bill faces up to the important challenges we face because of the declining level of effort needed to assure our national security. I urge its adoption.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Chairman, I want to express my support for H.R. 5504, the Department of Defense appropriations bill for fiscal year 1993. This is a fiscally responsible bill that is below the President's request and under the budget allocation.

As produced by the Defense Subcommittee, this legislation provides a good balance in funding for our active duty and reserve personnel; procurement of needed weapons systems for the services; and, investment in new technologies to keep our Armed Forces the best in the world.

While I support the bill, I must express my opposition to a provision that was added in the full Appropriations Committee. This provision would allow military medical facilities overseas to offer abortion services to service personnel and their dependents. I oppose this provision and urge its deletion before passage of the bill.

In conclusion, I want to express my personal thanks to Chairman MURTHA, the ranking minority member, Mr. MCDADE, and Mr. LEWIS, a member of the subcommittee. The chairman, JOE MCDADE and JERRY LEWIS and their staffs worked with me on a number of programs in the bill and I want to thank them for their professionalism and fairness.

This is an excellent bill which will help protect our national security in a cost-effective manner. I support its approval by the House.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, today we are considering H.R. 5504, the fiscal year 1993 Department of Defense appropriations bill. This bill provides a total of $252.7 billion for the Department of Defense—$17.5 billion less than appropriated for the current fiscal year.

Any time you cut $17,500,000, as this bill does, difficult decisions must be made. I want to express my appreciation to Chairman MURTHA and to JOE MCDADE for their outstanding leadership in guiding the defense appropriations subcommittee through a difficult markup of this bill.

This bill recognizes the fact that the world has changed dramatically—though the threat our Nation faced from the Soviet Union has essentially disappeared, we still live in a world of uncertainty and danger. Yet, the threats we face today differ in significant respects and the reductions being made in defense are, for the most, both proper and necessary.

We are reducing the size of our Armed Forces and reorienting that force to one that will rely less on forward deployments and will instead be based more in the continental United States. I feel strongly that as we draw down our force levels, the amount we expend to bring in new recruits should also be reduced. Over the last 3 years, I have worked to reduce the military recruiting and advertising budgets from $645 million to $505 million—including a $36.8 million cut this year.

There are, however, parts of the bill I do not fully agree with. Funding for the strategic defense initiative has been reduced by over $1 billion below the President's request. I continue to believe that an active ballistic missile defense is needed. Despite agreements to reduce United States and Russian strategic weapons, the threat posed by intercontinental ballistic missiles has not disappeared; and, as the Persian Gulf conflict demonstrated, there is a growing ballistic missile capability in developing nations. For these reasons, I support the administration's request for funding SDI and theater ballistic missile defenses.

I also regret that, during the meeting of the full Appropriations Committee, language was added requiring U.S. military treatment facilities located overseas to provide abortions. The problems with this provision are many—foremost, I feel it is wrong, it is also unnecessary since it has already been added to the defense authorization bill, and it will certainly lead to a veto by the President.

Mr. Chairman, it is my hope that the bill will be improved by the time we have completed a conference with the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for so skillfully crafting a responsible piece of legislation for consideration by the House today.

I take this moment at this juncture in the debate simply to advise Members that language was added in Committee—over the objections of the chairman and ranking members—to force overseas military hospitals to provide abortion on demand.

It is our deep hope that this harmful, antichild provision be excised in conference. Obviously if that doesn't occur, pro-life Members will be compelled in conscience to vigorously oppose the conference report. Moreover, I am pleased to note that if this bill is presented to the President with any pro-abortion language in it, the President will veto the legislation.

I look forward to supporting a reasonable DOD appropriations bill that reflects today's challenges to the peace and security of Americans and other freedom loving peoples.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, as a Member of Congress and as a woman, I am appalled at the conduct of the Navy in conjunction with the 1991 Tailhook event. Because of the seriousness of this matter I want to express my strong support for the Appropriations Committee's decision to cut 10,000 personnel jobs from the Navy. I commend the committee for its bipartisan recognition of the abominable Tailhook incident that inflicted humiliation and suffering on 26 women—half of whom are Navy officers.

The behavior exhibited at the Tailhook convention was absolutely horrifying. Just as appalling, however, was the failure of the Navy to treat the women's complaints seriously and to respond in a timely fashion. Due to uncooperativeness and stonewalling by the Navy, it has already taken 9 months to conduct a wholly inadequate investigation.

The Federal Government has a responsibility to the Nation to set an example of professionalism and respect between men and women in the workplace. However, the number of U.S. servicemen participating in vulgar behavior and the pervasiveness of its acceptance from the bottom ranks to the upper echelons of the Navy created an atmosphere that allowed such conduct to take place entirely unquestioned.

Let me quote for just a moment from the Naval Inspector General's report on Tailhook:

> The inappropriate sexual behavior in the Navy and Marine Corps squadron and unit sponsored suites at Tailhook '91 had been accepted, tolerated, and condoned over the years, making it now the norm for Tailhook gatherings.

And—

> A common thread running through the overwhelming majority of interviews concerning Tailhook '91 was—"What's the big deal?" Those interviewed had no understanding that the activities in the suites fostered an atmosphere of sexual harassment, and that the actions which occurred in the corridor constituted at a minimum sexual harassment and in many cases criminal sexual assault. That atmosphere condoned, if not encouraged, the gang mentality which eventually led to the sexual assaults * * * There is every indication that nearly all participants made conscious decisions and were aware of their actions.

Members of Congress should know that the Tailhook convention has been similarly problematic in past years, yet as is clearly apparent, the inappropriate behavior was never corrected. Instead, implicit authorization of the behavior allowed for its repetition. But I assure you, this will no longer be the case.

The Appropriations Committee's bipartisan decision to cut 10,000 personnel out of disdain for the Tailhook incident puts teeth into its efforts to ensure that any potential for a repeat of this kind of incident will be stopped dead in its tracks. Whether in the public or private sector, perpetrators of harassment or discrimination must know that they will receive severe repercussions for their actions.

My colleagues, it is not enough that Navy Secretary Garrett resigns. There needs to be a full and complete investigation of this incident which is why Congresswoman PAT SCHROEDER and I, as co-chairs of the congressional caucus for women's issues, wrote a letter to Attorney General Barr to urge an investigation of the Tailhook convention by the Department of Justice. The women involved in this incident must receive justice.

Again, I commend the bipartisan efforts of the committee for sending a strong signal to the Navy that business as usual is unacceptable. From now on, we must assure anyone who participates in the armed services of the United States that they will be treated with dignity and respect regardless of their gender.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 5504, the fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill.

While the nearly $253 billion appropriated by this legislation represents a reduction from the spending of previous years, the Department of Defense continues to be funded at cold war levels that bear little relation to our present international security needs.

There will be much talk about how much is being cut from this year's DOD budget and how much we have cut in recent years but that talk is irrelevant. Spending on the Defense Budget must not be based on what was spent last year, or how much was cut from 2 years ago. It must be based on a determination of the real security needs of our Nation.

If we look at the world in which we now live, we see that our cold war foe of the past five decades is no longer our enemy and is virtually disintegrating before our eyes. If we look inward at our own country we see a crumbling infrastructure, a failing educational system, and a languishing economy. It is clear to me where our threats lie. We must invest in the critical needs here at home and not in a military that faces nonexistent threats abroad.

A look at some of the programs receiving funding illustrates the misplaced priorities of this bill. The B–2 program which was killed by two separate Congresses, which continues to be bedeviled by a search for a mission, and which continues to suffer from disturbing questions about its capabilities, has been revived by this legislation we consider today. Surely, the Congress can find better uses for $4 billion than purchasing four new B–2 bombers.

This bill also appropriates $3.2 billion for the strategic defense initiative. Along with the nearly $1 billion spent on theater missile defense systems this legislation appropriates $4.3 billion for missile defense systems.

The reality that spawned SDI passed. There is no Soviet Union any longer. Furthermore, we are in serious discussions with Russia and the other successor States to reduce existing nuclear arsenals. The results of these efforts can be seen in the arms reduction treaty that emerged from the recent United States-Russian summit.

There also still remains a great many questions about the technical feasibility of SDI. There are serious doubts that the technology required to make this system function are beyond our ability to produce. Yet, even if these technical problems can be solved, the cost of deploying a functioning system would be astronomical. This country simply cannot afford the tens of billions of dollars that would be needed to put into place the strategic defense initiative.

There is one part of this bill, however, that I would like to call attention to, and to commend. The $1 billion appropriated for economic adjustment and conversion represents a significant development. For decades, this country has invested in the development of a powerful military while neglecting critical infrastructure and economic needs. The results of this neglect surround us. Now, however, we are presented with the opportunity to reorient our spending priorities and reinvest in America.

There is much more that we must do to create rational spending priorities and to assist in the conversion of the American economy from a defense to a civilian orientation, but I applaud the Congress for taking this important first step.

When the Congress meets to consider a defense budget it must look at the national security needs of the Nation. Sadly, this budget does not do this. It ignores the real threats and needs of the country while continuing to fund the military at a level comparable to that at the height of the cold war. Mr. Chairman, I must vote no on H.R. 5504.

Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this bill which provides for the national security needs of our Nation.

This is a sound bill. It responds to current security needs and to anticipated future requirements.

I very much appreciate the work and leadership of the Defense Subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] and the subcommittee ranking minority member, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE]. With the cooperation of the subcommittee members and the support of their able staff they have brought to the House a bill which should be adopted.

As with past defense bills, this one has a broad impact on the Nation's future. First and foremost, it provides for the defense of our Nation and our national interests. Second, through its investments in people, technology, procurement, and operations and maintenance in this country it helps stimulate our national economy.

Historically, we know that technology developed for security purposes commonly has spillover effects on nonmilitary private sector progress. The bottom line is that defense investments regularly benefit Americans working in both defense and nondefense industries.

There is one item in this bill that I particularly want to mention. The provision is section 9108. It prohibits the use of funds provided in the bill from being used to award a contract for purchase of 4-ton dolley jacks if that equipment would be manufactured outside the United States.

At the request of Arkansans working in a manufacturing plant in Jonesboro, I got involved in this issue last year. These are outstanding workers. They make an excellent product. The 4-ton dolley jacks are sold in the private sector and had been sold to military departments.

Suddenly they found their jobs threatened by a decision of the Department of Defense to manipulate U.S. laws in a way to deny the 4-ton dolley jack defense sales to American manufacturers and their workers.

A contract was awarded to an organization in Israel.

The decision did not make sense to Arkansas workers, and it did not make sense to me. Last year, with the help of this subcommittee, the Congress prohibited future such decisions relating to 4-ton dolley jacks.

With the passage of time, concerns of the Congress and the Arkansas workers proved resoundingly responsible. Despite repeated deadline extensions of provisions of the Israeli organizations contract, that group failed to achieve compliance with the first article testing requirements.

In a June 26 letter response to a Freedom of Information Act request, the Department of Army has advised that "The contract has been terminated for default without the first article test report ever having been completed."

The Arkansas workers and I very much appreciate the help that the Congress, and particularly the leadership that the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense and its staff have provided on this past contract. And, we thank you for recommending action which would prohibit a repeat of the kind of action that lead to this problem.

I would explain to my constituents that it takes more time to right a wrong in Washington than it does to make a cotton crop in Arkansas.

Again, I urge that the House promptly pass this bill.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the fiscal year 1993 funding level for the DDG–51 Aegis Destroyer program. I support funding for four destroyers rather than the three destroyers provided in the committee bill for two fundamental reasons: first, the DDG–51 program is vital to our Nation's security; and second, it is a very successful and cost-effective program.

In our eagerness to cut defense spending, we must not neglect our fundamental security needs. We must recognize that as our naval forces are reduced, the roles and missions assigned to Aegis ships are likely to expand. The technology in these ships will help maintain U.S. maritime superiority around the globe for the next 40 years. And let us not forget how convincingly and dramatically the value of state-of-the-art forces was demonstrated during the Persian Gulf war.

Surface combatants comprise the largest segment of our current and projected naval fleet—150 of the 450 ships in the Defense Department's base force. The Arleigh Burke class destroyer will replace several obsolete surface combatant classes in the fleet. In addition, it will do that with greatly expanded capabilities, including the ability to simultaneously perform anti-air, anti-surface, anti-submarine, and strike missions. The efficiency of the Burke class is exactly the kind of direction we need to be going in as we downsize our fleet.

With respect to cost-effectiveness, the lead ship in the DDG–51 program, the USS Arleigh Burke, which was manufactured by Bath Iron Works in the State of Maine, was delivered below the Navy's lead ship cost goal.

And just what did the Navy get for that below cost ship? Assistant Navy Secretary Gerald Cann commented that: "The Arleigh Burke's performance during post-delivery tests and trials was spectacular. She completed the most rigorous testing yet undertaken in the Aegis shipbuilding program."

Mr. Chairman, last year Congress and the President supported procurement of five Aegis destroyers. The same number was procured in fiscal year 1990 and in fiscal year 1989. The Navy requested only four ships this year. That is a significant reduction in the program, but a practical one given our budget constraints.

The Appropriations Committee however, chose to fund only three ships. There is no question that dropping from a five-ship procurement in 1 year to a three-ship procurement in the very next year represents an abrupt change. The unavoidable fiscal impact of that abrupt change will be to significantly increase the end costs of this ship program which had heretofore been so cost-effective.

The impact of this abrupt reduction in the destroyer program is likely to be cost increases of at least 10 percent per ship. That unit cost increase on a three-ship procurement would total more than $250 million. If it is the will of this body to reduce the destroyer program, and I hope that it is not, then the sensible and cost-effective way to do it would be to go to a four-ship procurement this year, and to smaller quantities if appropriate in future years.

I wish that the Appropriations Committee had supported the DDG–51 request of the President, supported what our top naval strategists say that we need, and supported the view taken by the Armed Services Committee and the full House when it approved the Defense authorization bill less than 1 month ago. The President, the Navy, and the House all supported funding of four destroyers in fiscal year 1993. It is my strong hope that the final product coming out of conference will include that funding level.

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the full funding of $175 million contained in this bill for the National Aerospace Plane, or NASP Program.

First, I would like to congratulate the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. MURTHA, and the ranking member, Mr. MCDADE, for their strong support of this program.

Last year, despite defense cutbacks, the United States had a $30 billion trade surplus in aerospace, the largest of any industry. This trade surplus resulted in total economic output of $70 billion and well over 1 million jobs, and is a direct result in investment in aerospace and aviation research in decades past.

NASP is absolutely crucial to maintaining our leadership in this vital area. It has already led to important breakthroughs in materials, propulsion, aerodynamics, and computer fluid dynamics, to mention but a few. These would not have occurred without the NASP, and the likelihood of future breakthroughs will be severely limited if this program is canceled.

There is no doubt the technology for a single-stage-to-orbit, air-breathing vehicle is within reach, as evidenced by the fact that the Japanese, French, British, Germans, and former Soviet Union all have programs. In fact, the Russians recently successfully tested a hypersonic scramjet engine, which is the same type being planned for NASP.

Although the Russian effort brings the exciting possibility of the United States having the opportunity to buy this technology from the Russians, it also raises the disturbing scenario of another nation, such as Japan, acquiring this technology, and overtaking a suddenly dormant U.S. technological effort.

Many of us have supported this program for a significant amount of time, and strongly believe cancellation would deal a severe blow to America's competitiveness, and cause the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs.

Again, I congratulate the committee, and I urge my colleagues to support the full funding for the National Aerospace Plane which this bill contains.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5504, and I want to commend Chairman MURTHA, our colleague from Pennsylvania Mr. MCDADE, all the subcommittee members, as well as the staff for the outstanding job they have done in putting this bill together.

Mr. Chairman, the Defense Subcommittee has once again brought to this floor a bill that is good to our military personnel, good to our national security, and good to our country. It maintains a strong national defense while also doing its part to address the serious fiscal problems facing our country. H.R. 5504 is $8.5 billion below the President's request. It is $17.5 billion below the current year spending level. And the bill is nearly $4 billion below the level authorized by the budget resolution.

There are particular provisions of the bill which I think are very important to continuing our commitment to improving the quality of life for military families. Chairman MURTHA has been at the forefront in ensuring that military personnel and their families receive the services and support they need. The fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill takes important steps in improving health care services for military families.

First, the committee has insisted that the level of services under CHAMPUS not be reduced. Chairman MURTHA, in particular, has been very adamant in ensuring that CHAMPUS deductibles are not increased, and that negative incentives for CHAMPUS enrollment are not used. Second, the committee has taken steps to expand dental coverage for military dependents. With the cooperation of the Defense Department, this expanded coverage could be in place by as early as April 1993.

I commend highly the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Chairman MURTHA, for his stalwart support of our military personnel. If for no other reason, this bill deserves our support for the emphasis it has placed on quality of life issues for military personnel.

On a more local level, H.R. 5504 also provides $10 million to purchase the initial outfitting equipment needed to furnish a modern state-of-the-industry plating shop that will be constructed at McClellan Air Force Base in the coming year. The plating shop has received authorization and appropriation in the House-passed versions of the fiscal year 1993 military construction budget. It is important that the outfitting equipment also be funded in the fiscal year 1993 timeframe to ensure that McClellan can fully utilize the new facility as soon as possible.

H.R. 5504 also takes care of the California National Guard by providing $1.2 million in real property maintenance funds for various armory maintenance projects in California. This funding is important to improving Guard facilities throughout the State, such as fixing leaking roofs and repairing electrical damage. The California National Guard continues to play an important role in our national defense as well as in providing critical emergency services most recently demonstrated in the Los Angeles riots and southern California earthquakes.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to discuss briefly a very important issue addressed by this bill, and that issue deals with providing military personnel access to safe abortion services overseas. Since mid-1988, the Department of Defense has prohibited military personnel and their dependents from privately paying for abortions in overseas DOD facilities, even if there are no clinically safe private facilities available in the country in which they are stationed. This policy places in grave danger the life, health, and welfare of millions of American women who are dependent on the military health care system, which was expressly established for the purposes of meeting all the health care needs of DOD personnel overseas. Consequently, the gentleman from Oregon, Mr. AUCOIN, the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. MACHTLEY, and I have introduced a provision in the bill which will ensure that women in the military, or female dependents of service personnel stationed overseas, have access to complete reproductive health services.

This provision gives our women in the armed services, as well as female dependents of those serving in the military, access to the quality medical care that they deserve. It does not, however, in any way require the Federal Government to pay for abortions and in no way affects the so-called Hyde amendment, which prohibits the use of DOD funds to pay for abortions except where the life of the mother would be endangered. The AuCoin-Machtley-Fazio provision gives those women who serve our country overseas and rely on the Federal Government for their health care the same rights that the rest of us have, so long as they are willing to pay for them.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would just like to express again my strong support for H.R. 5504. I congratulate the committee and its staff for a job well done, and urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5504, the Department of Defense Appropriations for fiscal year 1993. I also wish to commend the efforts of both the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Chairman MURTHA and ranking minority member MCDADE. Once again, they have done an outstanding job with an always difficult bill.

I am pleased to see that, for the most part, H.R. 5504 complements the recently passed Department of Defense authorization bill produced by the Armed Services Committee. Both bills take into account the dramatic changes that have taken place over the past few years as well as tightening fiscal restraints.

Mr. Speaker, it is not an easy task sorting through all the important projects in the Department of Defense. Each one has its merits. It becomes an issue of prioritizing according to need and cost, while at the same time enhancing our national security posture. In the new era, we need to get more for less. H.R. 5504 does just that. It falls below both the Budget Committee allocations and the administrations request but never sacrifices our defense readiness or personnel.

There are a host of amendments to H.R. 5504 which would weaken the bill. I urge my colleagues to think carefully about each one before casting your vote. While peace is at hand, unrest does exist in many places throughout the world. Let us not cut haphazardly or foolishly.

I urge adoption of H.R. 5504 in its present form.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to express my sincere appreciation for the work done by the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations on a matter of great importance to northern Maine.

Since 1980, the Federal Aviation Administration has identified the need to provide substantially improved radar coverage for the northern Maine region. This vast region—almost as large as the State of Massachusetts—includes five aviation centers, including the Northern Maine Regional Airport in Presque Isle. Fortunately, Loring Air Force Base in Limestone, ME, has been able to offset the radar shortfall, and the region has enjoyed adequate coverage. But Loring will close in 1994, and this closure has serious implications for the future of radar coverage in northern Maine.

To ensure that northern Maine does not lose any coverage when Loring closes, the Maine congressional delegation has requested that the FAA construct a new long-range radar facility for northern Maine. We expect that the FAA will include this item in its fiscal year 1994 budget request, and we have been in contact with the Transportation Appropriations Subcommittee to inform the members of this important project.

Unfortunately, this long-range installation will not be operational for 2 years, leaving at least a 2-year gap in radar coverage between the new installation's operation and Loring's closure. Something must be done in the interim, and this is where the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and the members of the full committee have been of such great assistance to me and to the people of Maine.

Earlier this year, I contacted the subcommittee with a proposal to keep the radar equipment at Loring in place and operating until the new FAA facility becomes operational. The chairman, the ranking minority member, and their staffs cooperated fully, offering to include report language which directs the Air Force, in association with the FAA, to maintain its radar facilities at Loring so that adequate coverage can be provided to northern Maine during the interim period. The language was subsequently approved by the subcommittee and the full Appropriations Committee.

Inclusion of this report language is the first step toward resolving a very serious problem. Without adequate radar, commercial air service might decline, further hampering economic development in a region that will find the going tough in the wake of Loring's closure. But the Defense Subcommittee and the full committee have acted on a reasonable request to prevent this from happening. And the people of northern Maine are very grateful.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Chairman, I strongly support the provision in the Department of Defense [DOD] appropriations bill overturning the 1988 administrative policy prohibiting overseas military medical facilities from offering abortion services to service personnel and their dependents. Women who are overseas in service to their country must be allowed the same rights and health options available to them in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this week the Supreme Court ruled on Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania versus Casey permitting States to restrict access to abortion services. They held that women are still guaranteed reproductive choice and right to privacy under the Constitution. Yet the Department of Defense, through an administrative policy, not a law, has been able to deny women their right since 1988. Overturning this administrative policy does not, in any way, expand the laws regulating women's reproductive rights; it merely provides women who are overseas with the U.S. Government their constitutional right.

The Supreme Court held that restrictions on abortion services are permitted and lawful unless the restriction places an "undue burden" on the woman. I do not know how anyone can deny that having to travel to another country or even back to the United States to have access to an abortion service is not an undue burden.

I urge my colleagues to support the overturning of this provision and allow all American women their guaranteed right.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the amendments printed in House Report 102-647 and any amendments thereto shall be debatable for the time specified in the report, equally divided and controlled by the proponent and an opponent of the amendment.

Mr. MURTHA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, through page 119, line 2, be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any points of order on the bill?

The Chair hears none.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto conclude no later than 1:30 p.m. today.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there is a lot happening within the appropriations process which disturbs me, particularly as Congress begins to chip away at the research and development base in this country, the technology base on which we will built the future. This committee has attempted to do its best to see to it that that has not happened.

I have one concern, and it is really not this committee's fault in what comes before us today, but the one concern I have is that there was not money included in this bill for the SP-100 program, the SP-100 being a development program of a nuclear reactor that could be used in space based kinds of applications.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not include that, but I must say the Defense Department did not ask for the money for it, and that is a disappointment to me because the Defense Department does, in fact, have a memorandum of understanding where it is to work with NASA and the Department of Energy in developing the reactor. So, that is not the committee's problem but it is a loss to the technological base in this country not to fund the SP-100 program.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I will say that this committee does have within the bill several programs that it is funding which are extremely important to the national future. I would in particular to the National Aerospace Plane. This subcommittee is really leading the way in assuring that the National Aerospace Plane stays in place, and let me tell my colleagues what I think the importance of that project is.

This country has provided aeronautical leadership for the world for the last 75 to 100 years. We are the place, of course, where airplanes were developed, but not only that, we have always maintained our edge. We have done that by developing experimental airplanes that have led to the next generation of materials, the next generation of engine technologies, the next generation of aeronautics of one kind or another.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I just want to compliment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] for his support of what I consider one of the most important technologies in this country today. One of the reasons we are ahead in aerospace technology is because of people like the gentleman who have been in the forefront in making sure that the research money is available.

So, Mr. Chairman, I say to the gentleman, that I appreciate the work that you have done in this committee in its entirety. I have supported this position. Even though the funds get tighter, we think this kind of funding is absolutely essential to our national defense.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for that leadership because in all honesty in other sectors of the Committee on Appropriations we have not seen that kind of vision and foresight, and this subcommittee literally has led the way on this project and has assured that we keep this kind of program in place. I thank the gentleman for it because I think the Nation in the next century is going to benefit from the kind of leadership that he has shown.

That is also true in another project which this committee is moving toward, and that is called SSTO, and that stands for single-stage-to-orbit technology. This committee is going to permit that kind of technology to go to demonstration.

What does that mean for the future? It may well be that this will provide the technology that will allow us for the first time to do very economical lifts to orbit. We are not certain yet; it is a demonstration program, it is a research project. But if it proves out, this may be the way to space which assures that, not only does it have military applications, which of course this subcommittee is interested in, but it will have civilian applications both for manned space and for lifting loads of economic interest to the country such as communication satellites and that kind of thing.

So, Mr. Chairman, it is a very important technology that this committee has decided to fund.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROHRABACHER] came to me about the particular technology. We let him read our S&I report, and he came back and asked that we go forward with the project, and in conference we are going to attend to his request because I know that the gentleman and you know more about that program than we do, and we defer to your expertise in that field.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for that, and the gentleman from California [Mr. ROHRABACHER] has been in the forefront of that, and I thank the gentleman for working with him.

Finally one area where this committee has moved ahead is in the space nuclear propulsion area in assuring that, as we look towards perhaps deep space applications for manned exploration or other kinds of activities, that we may have, in fact the new generation of space engines based upon nuclear propulsion that would be available to us.

So this subcommittee really has in a very tight money situation seen fit to develop some of the high tech initiatives to drive the station toward the future. For the American people that is much appreciated because our jobs for the future depend upon developing those technological innovations. This committee, I think is moving toward that direction. I thank them, and I certainly am in support of their efforts.

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of our chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], I want to commend this subcommittee on the bill that is now before the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE], the ranking minority member of the subcommittee and every member of this subcommittee, Mr. Chairman, have worked hard to bring this bill before us at this time.

I would like to call attention to the fact that the bill contains, as our chairman has said, $252.7 billion. This is $3.8 billion below the section 602(b) allocation. This is an excellent bill. On this subcommittee we have an excellent staff, Mr. Chairman, just like we do on all 13 of our subcommittees on appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, passage of this bill today will mean that we have passed now in the House 7 of our 13 bills. Ten of our bills have been approved and reported out of the full Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, at one time in bringing out the bill that appropriates the funding for Labor, Health and Human Service, and Education, I thought we had established a right good record here in the committee about bringing that bill and passing it in 1 hour and 56 minutes. The chairman of this subcommittee and the ranking member of this subcommittee not too long after that brought this, the largest appropriation bill of the 13 out, and passed it in 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Now think about it, Mr. Chairman. It shows not only that they bring out good bills, but they know what is in the bill, and they know how to pass it.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely believe as one Member of this Congress that this is a real important bill. As my colleagues know, we have trouble all around the world still, and when we hear people say we ought to go into the defense appropriation bill and cut out another $30 billion or another $40 billion, we ought to keep in mind, Mr. Chairman, that, if we want to remain the strongest country in the world, bills like this one should protect our country. When we bring our bill in here, the one that I am chairman of, we say to the people in this country, "If you take care of the health of your people and educate your children, you continue living in the strongest country in the world."

On behalf of my chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], I want to thank every member of this subcommittee and their staff for an excellent bill.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as I have done with other appropriations bills, I want to rise in support of the Department of Defense appropriations bill. This is the seventh of the 13 annual appropriations bills to be considered by the House.

This bill, like the others, comes in below the 602(b) spending subdivisions that were provided. The bill provides $252 billion in discretionary budget authority and $263 billion in discretionary outlays. That is $3.8 billion less than the spending subdivision in 602(b) that was provided for the subcommittee in the budget authority and $3.6 billion below in estimated outlays.

I also want to point out that if we compare it to last year's levels—and I think that is important to do as well—we are looking, in regards to budget authority, to a bill that is $17 billion less than what was provided in budget authority last year and almost $10 billion to $11 billion less with regard to outlays.

That is not easy. We have all understood that the world is changing, and that the cold war is over, but it also represents a challenge to the committees and to all the Members that as we make this transition, we do it in a way that protects our national security and also provides for conversion to take place.

I want to in particular commend the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN], and the chairman of this subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], and his ranking member. Both Mr. ASPIN and Mr. MURTHA have been very helpful as we have tried to develop a rational defense path here in terms of savings. This is not an easy challenge. I think all of us understood that when there was a lot of feeling that we were going to have a huge peace dividend that could be spent easily, everybody needed to look at the facts and look at the tough challenges with regard to what kind of defense path we wanted to go in and what kind of efforts needed to be made with regard to conversion as we were facing these transitions. There are jobs involved here, there is an impact upon the economy, and there is an impact on people. That is the reality of dealing with these kinds of very though choices. Yet this subcommittee, as well as the Committee on Armed Services, have done, I think, an outstanding job in confronting these choices that needed to be made.

So I want to commend the subcommittee. I want to commend in particular the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for what he has done here in terms of investment. There is an economic investment piece here that does provide for help in trying to ease the transition for communities, industry, and personnel in assisting this build-down. It is not easy, but it is a challenge, and hopefully this Congress and this House will face as we approach the future.

[Fact Sheet]

H.R. 5504, Department of Defense Appropriations Bill, Fiscal year 1993 (H. Rept. 102–627)

The House Appropriations Committee reported the Department of Defense Appropriations bill for Fiscal Year 1993 on Monday, June 29, 1992. This bill is scheduled for floor action on Thursday, July 2, subject to the adoption of a rule.

COMPARISON TO THE 602(B) SUBDIVISION

The bill provides $252.5 billion of discretionary budget authority and $263.9 billion of discretionary outlays. This bill is below the discretionary budget authority and outlay subdivisions by $3.8 and $3.6 billion, respectively.

PROGRAM HIGHLIGHTS

The following are the major program highlights for the DOD Appropriations Bill for Fiscal Year 1993, as reported:

[In billions of dollars]

	Budget authority	New outlays
Military personnel	76.9	73.2
Procurement	55.6	9.2
Operations and maintenance	71.7	56.7
Research and development	38.8	20.8

The House Appropriations Committee filed the Committee's subdivision of budget authority and outlays on June 11, 1992. These subdivisions are consistent with the allocation of spending responsibility to House committees contained in House Report 102-529, the conference report to accompany H. Con. Res. 287, Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1993, as adopted by the Congress on May 21, 1992.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like at this point to enter into a colloquy with the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense of the Appropriations Committee.

This year, Mr. Chairman, our two committees appear to have taken a rather different approach with respect to the problems of naval aviation. We have taken a position that allows us to make choices about the future of tactical aviation and not make an estimate now that may turn out in the long run to be wrong. In particular, the authorization committee of the House, as approved by the House, has accepted a plan to specify robust prototyping for both the Navy FA-18 E/F and the Navy A-X attack air aircraft.

What is the view of the chairman of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee on this matter?

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I just want the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] to know how we have tried to mirror almost everything that he has done in the Committee on Armed Services, and as the gentleman and I have said over and over again, we have worked very closely on the results of our two bills.

In this particular case we felt it was in the best interest of the Defense Department to give them another option, and then we put some money in for the F-14 to make a choice, and hopefully by the time the gentleman goes to conference and make a final decision on what is going to happen, we will be able to consider his action. Our committee, even though it was unanimous in its position on the way we did it, understood why you are trying to give the Navy another option. So we are very considerate of the gentleman's position, and we certainly want to consider what he did when we go to conference.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I do want to commend him and commend the members of his committee and our committee in working it out so we are at least united on some of the major issues. I appreciate the assurances that whatever we do in the authorization conference on this very important attack-air matter will be considered by your committee and your conference.

There is one other issue I just wanted to make sure we clear up, and that is this issue of the defense reinvestment. As the Members of the House here know, it was part of the budget resolution that there was $1 billion set aside for defense reimbursement, and what we would like to know is whether you are as committed to the defense reinvestment. The gentleman has a different version in his bill, and so we would just like to know what his views are on that when we go to conference.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I remember asking the gentleman about the issue when he was on the floor. We like what you did. However when it comes out of conference, and we feel that this is an area of responsibility of the Committee on Armed Services, we are going to cooperate in every way to fund whatever you come out of conference with.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that comment.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the chairman that I have been a skeptic on this reinvestment issue until after the work of the Committee on Armed Services, and I think it targets the work of trying to get the workers retrained, and the approach that has been taken answers many of my particular concerns.

I just want to commend the committee. I think the approach here which takes this kind of tack and deals with many of the high-technology issues we are going to face in a more competitive world environment is the right approach, and I think we ought to be supportive of this.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's comments, and I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to speak in terms of the F-18E/F that the gentleman talked about, and I would like to thank the chairman for being so helpful on the issue.

I would hope that our committee and those Members in the conference, and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], were to get off the dime one way or the other, that if we do not fund the F-14, then we need to get on with the F-18E/F, or the delay where we pick up the F-18E/F with an A-X will mean the demise of naval aviation and we will not have the procurement dollars to do that.

My only fear is that, although I do not support the F-18E/F, if we do not support the F-14 throughout, we have got to do something, Mr. Chairman, because otherwise we will kill naval aviation.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ASPIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I have to say after talking with the gentleman from California and with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER], we left the third option in. Nobody has more respect for the gentleman's experience as a combat pilot than I do, and combined with the opinions of our engineer, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER], the gentleman's opinions carried a lot of weight in our committee when we made the decision to add extra money for the F-14.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Let me just say to all my colleagues here that we do need to move ahead with this air program of the Navy, this naval aircraft program, but I think it is very important that we do it in such a way that it accomplishes two things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ASPIN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, to continue, there are two things we feel are important here. First that the program be affordable. In other words, if we are going to the F-18E/F and the A-X, we ought to make sure that is affordable. It is not at all clear that the Navy's program is affordable.

Second, we want to make sure that if we do have an affordable program, we get the best program. I happen to think we still need a strategic bombing mission that comes off the carriers, but that is at the core of this debate.

So I would just like to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] again for his cooperation on these major issues and for his assurances on these two issues that we are talking about, which is the Navy TECAIR and the reimbursement package.

Mr. Chairman, let me at this point yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to, for a second, associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin, Chairman ASPIN. What we do not want to find ourselves in is a position where we as a Congress have no choice, that we go forward with the EF because the Navy would like to get that thing cooking so it reaches a point where we cannot make a choice between that or perhaps some other aircraft—like the gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] has suggested—and clearly we are going to go forward with an AX. The question is, what can we afford? We do not want to get ourselves put into a position where we have no choice, too many decisions were made, and we just do not have any choices to make at that point.

So I think we are proceeding—and I must say, on a bipartisan basis—in the Armed Services authorizing committee, we are proceeding in a way in which we can have some prototypes and we can get ourselves in a position where we do not have too many things put on our plate with an inability to make good decisions at a later point in time.

I want to commend also the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for his incredible working relationship with the authorizers, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE], as well, and I want to support the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN], the chairman, in this.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to rise to say how I, and many others, thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for his incredible leadership during this difficult period we have been going through with the military, on whether or not our service women are going to be considered equal or not.

I think when women were let into the military we went through a long period where a lot of the military did not want them, and so the message was, the culture did not have to change, women had to accept it the way it was. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been absolutely out front every day of the week saying that is nonsense. He has had a very distinguished military career, and he knows that one can have a distinguished military career and can be part of a strong fighting force, and yet not have to abuse or take on women. That is not part of the code.

Therefore, I must say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], he has been a true officer and a gentleman, and he has been a true leader in this area. I really salute him.

This is a time where, with the Voting Rights Act and everything, we have been going through a debate in this country about can anyone represent women but women, can anyone represent African-Americans but African-Americans, can anyone represent Hispanics but Hispanics, and men but men. Let me tell the Members, representative government comes apart if that happens. However, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has done a much better job of representing women than any of the women here could because of his position, and he has listened to them and he has been a very, very important advocate. I think people listen to him even more than us, because they say, "There go those women again," but they are hearing the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I just want the American men and women to know what a terrific job he has been doing, and representative government is working here. I thank the gentleman from the bottom of my heart.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Earlier today, in a 1-minute, I said words to the effect that I want to thank the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] for bringing this up, and again, I want to salute the gentleman from Pennsylvania for very sharply defining the issue. It may be what some would call a sort of undifferentiated penalty that he is wreaking, but I think it will have the intended result.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Absolutely, and I cannot say enough about that, because in this important debate we really know so often we are not heard, and those pleas have been heard and he has been at them.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of the bill, and I would like to salute the gentleman. As had been said earlier today and just a moment ago by the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] has invoked a very, very stern sanction on the Navy for the failure of its leadership to show leadership, in going to the heart of the indignities that the 26 military women suffered in the Tailhook convention last year in Las Vegas. As I said earlier on the floor, it was not just the 26 military women who were embarrassed and assaulted and demeaned in Las Vegas, it was all military women, and, without much of an extension, it was all women, whether military or nonmilitary.

I thank the gentleman, and I believe in thanking him I do so for all Members of the House, for having very sharply focused on the issue. It may be a fairly random penalty, it may be that there are certain ways to more narrowly target the offenders later in the process, but I think the gentleman's decision to make a very broad-brush approach to a very desperate problem I think is very supportable, and I want to thank him for doing that.

I would also like to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for his leadership on the overall bill. These are, as has been said earlier, difficult times in Defense, and there is a need to have a person like the gentleman to try to make the judgments as we move from wartime to peacetime.

I would like to thank him for having included in this bill $7.9 million to fund, on a continuing basis, the Advanced Gun Weapons System Technology Program, which is located at the Naval Ordnance Station, which is in Louisville, KY, my district. This, as the gentleman knows, is research to prevent obsolesence in the Navy's gunfire capability. It is also to start development on technologies we would use in the 21st century. It also has the ability, in the more near term and the immediate sense, to improve existing gunfire systems, both the offensive category as well as the defensive category on the various ships.

In the years that I have represented Louisville and represented Naval Ordnance Stations Louisville, I have been very proud of the activities done by both the military and the civilian personnel, the 2,500 men and women who work at Naval Ordnance. And, I want to thank the gentleman for his continuing recognition of their professionalism and of their patriotism in having funded this gun technology program.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the previous speaker. Last night, Mr. Chairman, I heard a Member from the other side of the aisle address the subject of Tailhook. I would like to commend him, because in that address during special orders the gentleman spoke to the many men, the hundreds and thousands of men and women of all services that serve honorably in our Armed Forces that were not a portion of the festivities that took place or among the guilty. Unfortunately, they have been tarred and feathered or painted with the same brush that many of the perpetrators did.

I would like to commend Paula Coughlin, who is one of the young ladies. They say she was sexually abused. In my opinion, I would carry it further. I think she was criminally abused, and I think that the perpetrators ought to be found guilty and brought forward. However, I am sorry to see the Secretary of the Navy, Secretary Garrett, resigning. He has been an honorable man, but unfortunately, within the armed services people have taken responsibility for the people underneath them, and Secretary Garrett followed that, although I disagree with it.

I would like to make a public statement that I think that Secretary Garrett has been helpful to both sides of the aisle, supportive of women's rights and of men's rights in the Department of Defense. I would also hope that in the future, I would say, there have been talks about firing entire lines of commands from commanders. How far do we go on this? Do we need to find out who the guilty were? Absolutely. Was Paula Coughlin abused? Even more than abused, the answer is "yes." But I think we need to be very careful that we do not tar and feather honorable people that represent this country and have represented this country faithfully.

Second, I would again laud the members of this subcommittee for their work on the defense appropriations. However, I am not naive enough not to know the liberal leadership of this country, and I would hope that the members of this subcommittee would direct in the amendments, the President has cut 30 percent out of Defense, and I have heard some honorable statements, such as from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Natcher] and so on, but we cannot cut more out of our defense without affecting the rest of the country.

Until we pass the President's jobs bill, the conversion package of the chairman, Les Aspin, will not do any good. We have hundreds of thousands of people being laid off and no jobs. So we need to work to that end.

At the same time, industry is attempting to convert from defense industry. But there is no one in this body, I would think, who would believe that we are not going to be in a conflict within the next 20 years, and we need to prepare for that. The 30 percent cut of the President allows for that and still gives this country the protections that we need.

Please, fight the liberal leadership in trying to cut this even further. Russia has an aircraft called SU-27. It has a missile called Long Burn Alamo which is far superior to even our AMRAAM missile that is coming down the pike. They are stealthing their ships, they are dropping nuclear class submarines, and yes, there is still a threat there.

Can we reduce? Yes, we can, and we are doing that at a rate based on what the real threat is out there and how fast our commercial institutions can transfer over from defense initiatives.

Mr. Chairman, I am in support of this bill, and I thank the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, Mr. Murtha and Mr. McDade, for doing such a fine job. But I do caution this body again, there will be those liberal left-wingers that try to cut the defense of this country, and I will fight them.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PENNY

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Penny: Page 37, after line 10, insert the following caption:

(INCLUDING RESCISSION)

Page 38, after line 10, insert the following: "Of the funds made available under this heading in the Department of Defense Appropriations Act, 1992 (Pub. L. 102-172; 105 Stat. 1150, 1166), $25,000,000 for the Arctic Region Superconducting Center is rescinded."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Penny] will be recognized for 10 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 10 minutes.

Is the gentleman from Alaska opposed to the amendment?

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Absolutely opposed, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. Young] will be recognized for 10 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. Penny].

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would rescind a project funded in last year's defense appropriation bill. The project has to do with a supercomputer for the University of Alaska.

This project has not been approved through normal procedures. It has not been authorized by the appropriate committee here in Congress. It is not subject to the peer review process that governs the award of research projects of this nature in most instances. It is not a project that has been deemed a priority by anyone in the scientific community.

It was placed in this bill last year at the request of the Senator from Alaska [Mr. Stevens]. The funding amounts to about $25 million to purchase this supercomputer system. The argument made in favor of the system by its author is that it would support research pertaining to the aurora borealis. The notion is that we can somehow capture or harness the energy of the northern lights, bring that energy down to Earth and provide some useful application thereto.

Again, no one in the scientific community believes this to be an item of importance to America's future, or an item of importance in terms of the scientific benefits that would accrue from such research.

There is also a serious question as to whether we need to spend money for this kind of a supercomputer at this particular university. These supercomputers are to be located at several universities across the country today. They are available broadly and one can make a contractual arrangement to participate in the use of supercomputers at another location. There is little available evidence to demonstrate that such a system needs to be purchased and placed at the University of Alaska.

It should be noted that Citizens Against Government Waste and many other organizations that monitor Federal spending with an eye toward pork barrel spending have identified this project as one of the most egregious examples of pork barrel spending on the books. For that reason, earlier this year I introduced a specific bill to rescind funding for this project.

I appreciate the fact that the Rules Committee made in order an amendment to this bill which would allow us to rescind this project, and I would urge my colleagues to accept the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, there is an old saying about being penny wise and dollar foolish. I am going to change that to being penny dumb to dollar wise.

In the first place, this has nothing to do with the aurora borealis or the northern lights. This in fact is an effort to buy supercomputers that will be stationed at the University of Alaska with the support of the State of Alaska of over $5 million.

It is ironic to me that the computers themselves are made in the district of the gentleman from Minnesota, or next to his district in Minnesota. The money to be spent that he is cutting, he is cutting from his State, and I commend him for that. That means that the people that work in Minnesota will be further unemployed. And I do commend him for it and for cutting jobs from his people. It costs no jobs in Alaska. This money is being spent in his State. We are talking about buying computers and putting them in our State, and remember these computers are supercomputers and there are three of them, not just one, three of them to be purchased and put around the United States to study, and especially in the Arctic, the warming effects on this Nation, the effect upon the environment, and what we can study on what has happened in the past, what we can project in the future for the good of mankind. It is for research. Yes, it is at the University of Alaska.

There has been no objection from any of the scientific community. In fact, there has been, contrary to the gentleman's statement, great support from the scientific community for these computers.

It is ironic to me that this computer is not just, as he said, for the aurora borealis. In fact, that has nothing to do with it. It is for the Defense Department. Everybody in the Federal agencies will have access to these computers, and it is just the advanced stage of the computer system. I will be truthful. It probably will be stationed in Washington, DC, and we can study the hot air effects. There is enough of that around here.

But what we are talking about is the Arctic, and the future of America is in the Arctic. It is where our resources are in the fossil fuels, the minerals, and even the food chain. We are the only nation that does not understand that. Russia, the Soviet Union has extensive study going on in the Arctic. We had hopes that the supercomputer could combine with some of their studies. Iceland, Greenland, Canada are all working to study the Arctic. In fact, we have an Arctic Commission now. It has always been the Antarctic.

But the future of this Nation, to protect it from the warming effects—if it is happening—to identify the results and why it is occurring, were to be conducted through this computer, through the University of Alaska. And unfortunately, the gentleman recites, as usual, those who do not do a great deal of studying. It is popular on TV, we are going to cut the pork. And I will say it is Minnesota pork. So I am happy for the gentleman. If he wants to cut jobs out of his State, put his people out of work, not study for the future, not protect this Earth or the so-called environmental damages, not understand where we are going, congratulations, you are an extremely great legislator for doing nothing.

This is a bad amendment, and I will say this amendment will not survive. The committee came out with a good bill, and I expect a good bill to come back to the floor. So the gentleman can have all of the wishes he wants. He can go back to his so-called taxpayers' unions and all of the other groups of people, and he can go out and say look what I have done. And I congratulate him for costing jobs in Minnesota. He has done an exceptionally good job of making his people be out of work.

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FAWELL].

Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of Mr. PENNY's amendment to rescind the $25 million appropriated in fiscal year 1992 for the Arctic region supercomputer at the University of Alaska. This project is a classic example of what happens when a spending project calling for science research bypasses the basic appropriation and authorizing procedures of this House.

It becomes an embarrassment because it was never authorized, not subject to hearings, not competitively awarded, not subject to science peer review. Most of the time, science research projects which have been put thru the customary budget and authorizing procedures will not boomerang to cause this body ridicule and embarrassment.

Sponsors of the project claim the supercomputer would be used to harness the energy of the aurora borealis and bring it to Earth to augment our energy supplies. Because no scientific peer review has been done to evaluate the proposal, however, we do not really know if there is any hope of achieving such a high-minded goal. After being asked to evaluate the project—after the funds had already been appropriated—several respected scientists have said the project is unworkable at best, and wacky at worst. Robert Park of the American Physical Society stated in a letter to Congressman PENNY that:

> The $50 million or so devoted to this program so far supports basic research of such low priority that it had no prospects of funding under any sort of competitive peer review.

He goes on to state that—

> Any process for allocating scientific funds that does not include a serious, competent, and objective evaluation of the quality of the science is going to result in lower-quality science overall. The public should not be asked to support less than the best science available; the substitution of political clout for serious evaluation makes that result inevitable.

I know I have stood on this floor and said it again and again, but I must remind my colleagues that we are in the midst of a terrible budget crisis which is impeding our ability to support national priorities on a variety of fronts, including housing, education, health care, and infrastructure development. We have a $4 trillion national debt and will add a half-trillion in new debt to that figure both this year and next.

It is no longer possible in the face of those staggering numbers that we continue to fund projects which have not been duly reviewed—that have not undergone hearings, peer evaluation, and competitive bidding. There is much talk in this body about the decline in American competitiveness—the Science Committee, on which I sit, just marked up a bill to address the issue. Spending our limited dollars on science projects which have not been duly reviewed and evaluated is completely irresponsible when we so obviously need quality basic research. You get what you pay for and we will have no one to blame but ourselves if we purposely allocate limited research dollars for such pie-in-the-sky projects.

Mike Kinesly recently wrote that there is a bit of hypocrisy in us all. We all hate the deficit in general but specifically we love the Federal largesse which come to our district. Thus, Members of both sides of the aisle cater to this hypocrisy. In fact, at times this body seems to circle our wagons to protect one of our body whose district might suffer the loss of some Federal spending in that district, despite the fact that the spending has no national significance to justify it. Indeed, the other day I was criticized on the floor of this House because I sponsored an amendment to cut spending of a research project which would have benefited a project in my State—and for the same reasons I oppose this research project—it never went through the rigorous budget and appropriations processes of this body. I understand and accept such criticism. But today, with the fiscal crisis facing the Federal Government, all of us, it seems to me, must not try to avoid procedures of this House which are designed, as best we can, to assure the people of this Nation that we shall spend only for programs which have a significant national purpose.

For these reasons, I support the Penny amendment.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the merits of the amendment are well understood, and I would ask for favorable consideration.

The amendment rescinds $25 million earmarked in the fiscal 1992 Defense Appropriations Act for a supercomputer at the University of Alaska.

Background: In the fiscal 1991 Defense authorization bill the Strategic Environmental Research and Development Program [SERDP] was established as a way to apply defense resources to environmental problems. For the most part, SERDP itself was noncontroversial. Funds were to be awarded to worthy researchers to study environmental needs; $25 million was earmarked in the fiscal year 1992 Defense Appropriations Act for a supercomputer center at the University of Alaska, without specific authorization and in violation of agreement among the authorizing and appropriations committees that only competitively awarded grants would be made.

The Senate author of this earmark claimed on the Senate floor that this money would fund research to "harness the power of the aurora borealis [the northern lights] and bring it down to earth." Scientists at the University of Alaska, on the other hand, have publicly stated that harnessing the energy of the northern lights was never an objective of this project. Critics at the Energy Department, NASA, and the Department of Defense have raised many questions about this project that have for the most part gone unanswered.

The science community has called this project a big waste of dollars. The executive director of the American Physical Society, Dr. Robert Park, wrote me in April: "The concept of extracting usable energy from the aurora is totally wacky." Dr. Park went on to say: "The important thing is that this sort of waste is the inevitable consequence of a system that allows funds to be earmarked for research projects in the absence of merit review by qualified and disinterested experts." An employee of the University of Alaska—familiar with the project—wrote "––* I agree with you 100% concerning the lack of need for a supercomputer."

Sky," Professor Wong, one of the scientists involved in this research, was quoted as saying "Professor Akaasofu [the Director of Geophysical Institute at the University of Alaska] and myself have never claimed it was a way of taking energy to the ground." Critics in the Defense and Energy Departments and NASA have repeatedly raised serious reservations about the aurora borealis project that have mostly gone unanswered.

While DOD and Energy has negotiated with the University of Alaska to find a more suitable use for these funds, they have yet to award the $25 million grant, and questions remain. And, importantly, the fiscal year 91 Energy and Water Appropriations Act (P.L. 101–514) directs the Energy Department to "in cooperation with the University of Alaska, to determine the capability and type of supercomputing facility for research activity conducted by the Center for Global Change and Arctic Systems Research and Geophysical Institute, with specific reference to auroral energy research." The Director of the Office of Energy Research at DOE just wrote on June 30 that "the results of this report will be used to finalize the grant." Clearly, Alaska is engaged in a process to begin research on the northern lights, despite their own remarks to the contrary.

This is the most egregious example of pork barrel yet to pass through the doors here. It has had many lives, many justifications, and more critics than any single project funded here in a long time. The Washington Post called the project Pork In the Sky and recently, Newsweek labeled this project a prime example of what they called rotten pork.

Citizens Against Government Waste, the Porkbusters Coalitions, the science community, and many in the education community oppose this project.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my very good friend, the very distinguished chairman of the committee, one of the great heroes of Desert Storm, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], to enter into a colloquy.

Mr. Chairman, I recently discovered, as did the gentlewoman from New York [Ms. MOLINARI], who together with me represents the Fort Hamilton Army Base in New York, that the 26th Army Band, which is based there, is scheduled for deactivation. Both of us, and our constituents—indeed, all New Yorkers—are very concerned about this, because this band has become an integral part of our community. It has led parades ranging from the welcome we gave to the returning veterans from Desert Storm to the hostages who came back from Iran in 1981, and given innumerable concerts in the surrounding area. It has greatly enhanced the morale not only of the men and women of our armed services who are based in New York, but also of the patriotic people who live in that neighborhood.

We understand that to keep this band going it would cost only about $50,000 in addition to the salaries that they would in any case be receiving even if the band is deactivated.

My question for the chairman is: Would it be his hope that in this rather substantial budget for the Department of Defense, that they might be able to find the funds to keep this very important military unit and band in operation?

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, after conversations with the gentleman and in talking to the other members of the subcommittee, the gentleman has convinced us that this is a valuable asset to the Defense Department, and we are going to do everything we can to see that this is funded and that this activity continues.

Mr. SOLARZ. I want to thank the chairman very much, since I know it was in no small measure due to his efforts that Saddam Hussein was ousted from Kuwait, and I am confident that with his support, we will be able to keep the 26th Army Band in Fort Hamilton.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. IRELAND

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. IRELAND: Page 24, line 24 through page 25, line 2, strike out ": and an additional amount of $1,900,000,000 to be derived by transfer from the Defense Business Operations Fund".

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer this amendment to deny the use of $1.9 billion in excess defense operations fund cash to purchase two Navy DDG–51 destroyers.

Mr. Chairman, if my amendment is approved, I will offer a second amendment to transfer that $1.9 billion to the Treasury Department to reduce the national debt.

The Pentagon has set up the Defense Business Operations Fund, known as the DBOF, to serve as its own private slush fund to pay for the goodies it wants without having to answer to the Congress or to the public for any of those.

The President has requested the three Navy DDG–51 destroyers, and I want my colleagues to understand that I do support the funding of those destroyers, but it must be done with funds specifically appropriated for that reason, not by using a new Pentagon slush fund.

The Defense Business Operations Fund was created by clever Pentagon bureaucrats to replace the M account that the Congress wisely shut down in 1990.

DBOF acts as a huge umbrella agency within the Department of Defense to sell the various branches goods and services. The military services receive billions of dollars in direct appropriations from Congress each year to make purchases from DBOF. The problem is that there is no cost control exercised over what DBOF decides to charge for its goods and services. DBOF money managers can then jack up the price of goods to generate huge cash surpluses with no audit trail and no accountability.

The revenue generated by DBOF in less than 1 year rivals that of multinational corporations. In fact, in private industry, it would rank as the fifth largest corporation in the world, sales revenues just behind Ford and Exxon. Currently DBOF shows excess funds of at least $2.8 billion. Everyone is trying to tap into it. There are no controls over this money, and I find it very dangerous.

The appropriations bill we are considering today provides $1.9 billion in excess DBOF cash to pay for two of the three destroyers under consideration. DBOF money should not be used to purchase destroyers.

The committee has appropriated $5.5 billion for shipbuilding. We are led to believe that three of these destroyers can be purchased for $682 million when, in fact, they will cost $2.6 billion. This maneuver, in turn, frees up $1.5 billion to buy two amphibious ships that were neither requested by the Pentagon nor authorized by the Congress.

This is the type of maneuver that can happen with every excess dime of DBOF funds. The net effect of the DBOF price fixing is to rob the armed services of money they need for training and battle-readiness.

The cost of defense is inflated to buy the kinds of special-interest items we should have gotten rid of when we left the 1980's and the cold war ended.

As a further example of the DBOF fund, we were recently asked in the authorizing committee to approve a reprogramming of $2.3 billion, using $838 million again from the DBOF account. Fortunately, our chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN], has opposed this, and it will likely not happen.

Do not misunderstand me, the President has requested three destroyers, and I am not against funding them.

But their cost should be accounted for out in the open and directly appropriated by the Congress.

I urge my colleagues to vote to deny the use of this $1.9 billion in unaccounted and unauthorized funds. If these funds are indeed excess money the DBOF has managed to rack up, they should be returned to the Treasury to reduce the debt.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Let me just say that I appreciate what the gentleman has said. I know he has been in the forefront in trying to eliminate the M accounts and I appreciate his expertise.

Now, there is no one committee that has paid more attention to these DBOF accounts than we have. As a matter of fact, your Subcommittee on Defense has continually tried to make sure that the amount of money that they use is limited and that the authority they use is limited, because we were concerned about being able to follow where the funds go.

Now, I do not know what the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is, whether he is trying to eliminate these destroyers or whether he is trying to eliminate DBOF, but I will tell you this, we went to the Navy and we talked at great length. We found that the schedule to put an amphibious ship in would fit in much better than putting in the other destroyer.

We have a great concern that if this amendment were to pass, you could for all intents and purposes eliminate the amphibious shipbuilding capability at two shipyards.

To say that this is a DBOF amendment is absolutely inaccurate. This amendment is an amendment to kill several shipyards.

We carefully analyzed this situation. The subcommittee was unanimous in its suggestion of this recommendation to the full House and we think your amendment is a serious mistake.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge the Members to defeat this amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURTHA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding to me.

This is not only an assault on a very weakened part of our industrial base, that is, our shipyards, but also on our very weakened ship construction program. We have cut back drastically from the 600-ship Navy that we felt we needed in the mid-1980's to the point where we have barely what we need to manifest power projection around the world.

This will kill the DDG–51's; also it will put in extremis the LHD and also the ammunition ships in which we are in very short supply.

So the consensus from the Bush administration is that what we have in shipbuilding now meets a very minimal requirement and that we need to fund this construction, and this in fact would have a disastrous effect on it.

Mr. Chairman, I concur in the committee chairman's recommendation.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize to the gentleman who knows I regard his work very highly and have in my term in the Congress.

I want to clearly emphasize that there is no intention here to say that we should not build the destroyers. My real concern is the $1.9 billion that was appropriated to the services for other activities utilized by the DBOF. The DBOF generated at least $1.9 billion, if not more, of funds that were not for the purposes of shipbuilding.

What we are doing is running around the barn with money that really belongs to the taxpayers of this country to build these ships. I am all for building the ships. I like the way the gentleman and his committee decide what we ought to do.

My real concern is where this $1.9 billion comes from. It is a slush fund and we all ought to band together to do this.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that. Let me assure the gentleman that we are watching DBOF. I know the gentleman has had an honorable period in Congress and I have the greatest respect for the gentleman.

But Mr. Chairman, I would ask the Members without a prolonged debate here to defeat this amendment, because this really would stop the shipbuilding program for the DDG–51 which the gentleman and I both consider very important.

But the gentleman can be assured that in the future we are going to continue to watch DBOF. We have the same concerns the gentleman does. The gentleman was instrumental in stopping the M account abuses, and we appreciate that. It was a real service to the country.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. IRELAND. The real question, Mr. Chairman, is how can we justify using DBOF money for shipbuilding or aircraft building or anything else? That was not what it was intended to be.

Mr. MURTHA. Let me say this. The reason for using the money is because it is taxpayers' money, like any other, and we wanted to make the decision in Congress by elected officials, rather than by bureaucrats when we could not follow the trail, so we wanted to make sure that we were the ones making the decisions, rather than them.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the money in DBOF was the money that this Congress appropriated for certain things that go into the list of what the DBOF is supposed to be doing. The DBOF does not have in its charter of activities weapons purchasing.

Mr. MURTHA. Well, we technically took excess cash in DBOF and said spend this excess cash, because we do not want them reprogramming it, we wanted them to spend it for these destroyers. That is what we have done.

Mr. MCDADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to this amendment, and I hope it will be defeated.

As I was saying to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, we often scoop up dollars that we can find and appropriate to a more efficient purpose.

For example, my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman, will recall I think it was in fiscal year 1986 or so where we found over $1 billion in savings from Navy shipbuilding accounts that we identified and used to finance that year's program for the MX out of those scooped-up dollars. We do that all the time. That is one of the functions of the Appropriations Committee. That is undoubtedly somewhat different than the culture that prevails on an authorizing committee, but for efficiency purposes, that is what we do.

Now, I do want to underline, Mr. Chairman, that amendment, should it pass, will stop the construction of all the Arleigh Burkes that are in the budget, and there are three of them in here.

It will leave about $700 million, which will not buy one Arleigh Burke.

You pass this amendment and 11,000 people walk the streets unemployed in the morning.

This is an amendment that is well-intended by my good friend, but the substantive purposes of it are detrimental to national defense, and I urge its defeat by my colleagues.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCDADE. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, I would say to my good friend, the gentleman from Florida, I know he does not intend to do this, but in the same 5-minute speech it seems to me the gentleman is saying two things. On the one hand, the gentleman says he supports the construction of three destroyers. On the other hand, the gentleman is saying, "But I'm going to take away the money to pay for them." So the construction will not go forward.

I would like to say to the gentleman that not only does it mean large numbers of unemployed people, but the people who will turn out being unemployed, who will walk away from the production lines of these very highly sophisticated destroyers and the instrumentation inside the destroyers, are not people that you go out on the street and just replace after they have been off the job and gone away.

So what we are saying here is that we understand the gentleman would like to find another way to fund them, and perhaps in conference we can find another way to fund them, but the fact of the matter is that if this line of destroyer production is shut down, both from the standpoint of the shipbuilding industry and from the point of view of the highly technical Aegis system that is contained in these ships, we are going to be shut down, not just for one year, but for a long period of time.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDADE. I am delighted to yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. DICKS].

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I, too, want to rise in opposition to the Ireland amendment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated it well. We have got a production line in place. If the Ireland amendment passes, it will destroy the DDG–51 program. That is the bottom line. It will cause 11,000 people to be immediately unemployed.

Another thing I want to point out is some people say, "Well, why didn't we fund four DDG–51's?"

The committee in its judgment felt that there was an opportunity to fund an additional LHD, and by doing it this year we saved $400 million in taxpayer money.

So please give the committee a little bit of judgment here. We look at these accounts carefully. There was extra money in the DBOF account and we used it for this program. I think it makes complete sense.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge the House to support the committee.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDADE. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE], for yielding to me.

I am strongly opposed to the Ireland amendment. It not only affects the ships that have been in discussion, but in Desert Storm we had Soviet hulls carrying our equipment.

The A&E program shipbuilding across the board, we have cut shipbuilding along with the help of the Japanese in this country. We used to be the greatest shipbuilder in the world. Now the only shipbuilding industry on the west coast, we have one, and on the east coast it is approaching the same thing.

This amendment would help the Japanese even further destroy our shipbuilding capability.

Mr. Chairman, I am strongly opposed to it.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDADE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. IRELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want it clearly understood, the idea that this amendment is directed at any particular thing is not what I have generated. That is how this $1.9 billion has been used in this bill. That $1.9 billion could have easily been used for an aircraft purchase or anything else.

The point is that the committee is using $1.9 billion of funds that were appropriated for other purposes that went into the DBOF, that were earned by the DBOF, that were not put in there for weapons purchases.

The point is not these destroyers. We would not have the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] seeking recognition, or others here, if these funds had gone to the B–2 or something of that nature. The point is, and the very clear point, is not which item the purchase went for here but the point that $1.9 billion should not have been used.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida. This amendment would have the effect of gutting the Navy's Aegis destroyer program and severely damaging our Nation's shipbuilding and defense electronics industrial base.

To put this amendment into proper perspective we must look at what the President, the Navy, and this House has said about the DDG–51 Aegis destroyer program already this year. President Bush requested funding for four destroyers in 1993. Our top naval strategists say we need four destroyers this year. The House Armed Services Committee supported four destroyers. The full House approved funding for four destroyers just last month in the Defense authorization bill. I was sorry to see that the Appropriations Committee decided to fund only three destroyers. However, the Ireland amendment will have the effect of funding only one destroyer. That is simply a level that is unacceptable in the face of our maritime needs.

We must recognize that as our naval forces are reduced, the roles and missions assigned to Aegis ships will expand. The technology in these ships will help maintain U.S. maritime superiority around the globe for the next 40 years. The Arleigh Burke class destroyer will replace several obsolete surface combatant classes in the fleet, and it will do so with greatly expanded capabilities. These ships are exactly the kind of direction we need to be going in as we downsize our fleet.

In addition, dropping from a five-destroyer buy in fiscal year 1992 to a one-destroyer buy in fiscal year 1993 will result in severe disruption in the program's stability and in production efficiency. The President, Congress, and the Navy all support a stable and robust destroyer procurement program. If this amendment passes, that program will take years to recover and will end up costing the taxpayers much more.

I urge my colleagues to defeat the Ireland amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

With all due respect, perhaps let me inject a moment of reality into this debate for the American people.

Mr. Chairman, let us talk a moment today about priorities—about where we want this Nation to go and what we want our future to be. And then let us talk about a Defense Department budget of $252 billion, plus $22 billion more for the military in other appropriations bills.

Five million children go hungry in America, 1 million children sleep out on the streets, and hundreds of thousands lack basic inoculations for diseases that should have been wiped out 20 years ago. We rank first in the industrialized world in terms of childhood poverty, with 20 percent of our kids falling in that category. Hundreds of thousands of bright young people cannot afford to go to college because the Federal Government is not adequating funding student financial aid programs. And today, despite the fact that the cold war is over, that the Soviet Union no longer exists, that the Warsaw Pact no longer exists, this Congress and this President have the unmitigated chutzpah to vote $4 billion for B–2 bombers. In other words, not enough money available to wipe out childhood hunger, not enough money available for college education—but $4 billion is available to build B–2 bombers.

Whenever this country wants to go to war, we hear the patriotic speeches about the need for young men and women to put their lives on the line to serve their country, and if necessary to die for their country. Two years ago, the Congress and the President cut $3.5 billion for veterans' programs, and it is no secret that our VA hospitals are grossly underfunded. And today, this institution and this President have the gall to talk about $3.2 billion more for the absurd star wars program. Three and a half billion dollar cutbacks in programs for our veterans, who have put their lives on the line for this country, and $3.2 billion more for an absurd and useless program which has never been needed.

Two years ago, this Congress and the President cut Medicare programs for our elderly by $43 billion and the President, and many Members of this Congress, want to slash Medicare even more. $43 billion cut from Medicare for the elderly, but today this Congress and this President are talking about spending over $100 billion a year to defend Western Europe and Japan against a nonexistent enemy.

Mr. Chairman, if you have read the latest newspapers, you will have noticed that the number of Americans who believe that the President is doing a good job is down to about 30 percent. Seventy percent of the people think that he's doing a pretty bad job. Now that is a pretty discouraging figure, except when it's compared to the U.S. Congress—an institution which is now approved of by less than 20 percent of the people. In other words, the overwhelming majority of the people believe that the President and the Congress are way out of touch with the needs of ordinary Americans, and that we need fundamental changes in the priorities of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, the American people are crying out for hope. They want quality education and a national health care system for all of our people. They want decent-paying jobs as we rebuild American industry and produce environmentally sound products. They want decent-paying jobs as we rebuild our crumbling infrastructure and build a modern mass transportation system, decent bridges, decent roads. They want decent-paying jobs, as we put our carpenters and electricians and plumbers back to work building the millions of units of affordable housing that this country desperately needs.

Mr. Chairman, let us stand up today for a new set of priorities for America and let us give hope back to millions of Americans who have lost it. Let us vote "no" on B-2 bombers and "yes" for our children; "no" on star wars and "yes" for our elderly and veterans; "no" on $274 billion for the military and "yes" for millions of decent paying jobs as we rebuild American industry and our crumbling infrastructure. Mr. Chairman, let us defeat this appropriations bill today and begin the process of developing a whole new set of national priorities so that, once again, the American people can believe in their Government.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to engage the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA], in a brief colloquy.

Mr. Chairman, in title II of your bill there are a number of accounts that exceed what was authorized by my subcommittee, and approved by the House. For example, the Navy operation and maintenance account in your bill is $1 billion dollars over what has been authorized. Other unauthorized examples range from an additional $700 million for the Air Force to $9 million for the World Cup Games. While funding for the World Cup Games is a relatively minor amount, it is an issue that the Readiness Subcommittee actively discussed, and specifically rejected, until further information was received by the Department. I believe that providing appropriations for these unauthorized projects, in spite of our concerns and actions, is inappropriate.

Your bill contains language restricting the obligation of these amounts until authorized by law. This lanaguage has been included in past House Defense appropriation bills, and seems to always be deleted in conference. Is this not correct?

Mr. MURTHA. Well, you know, in all these things sometimes it is not brought to your attention and even members of your committee come to us and ask us to put funding in for various projects. We always try to work very closely with the authorization committee after the conference is settled. As you know, we had to get a waiver in the rule in order to get the bill to the floor because none of the items were actually authorized. We work very closely with the authorizing committee to make sure we comply as closely as we can. I cannot speak for the entire subcommittee, but we will certainly do everything we can to comply with whatever the authorizing committee tries to suggest. We will fund—in the end, 98 percent of the programs that are authorized.

Mr. HUTTO. I appreciate very much the gentleman's desire to work with our committee and work on these unauthorized projects.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DURBIN

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DURBIN: page 37, line 18, strike out "$9,510,354,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,810,354,000".

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to strike $700 million from the $4.3 billion appropriation for the strategic defense initiative, otherwise known as star wars.

I would remind the members of the committee that this program was designed under President Reagan to defend the United States against possible attack from Soviet missiles. We know full well that the Soviet Union, as it was envisioned in those days, no longer exists. President Yeltsin has spoken to this body and to our Nation. He has entered into an historic agreement with the President to reduce the number of strategic warheads aimed at the United States. In other words, we are spending literally billions of dollars to defend against a threat which no longer exists.

Second, the American taxpayers have invested $29 billion into the star wars program to date. At least $8 billion of the $29 billion has been totally wasted. We have put the money into projects which have been cancelled. We have, in fact, given the money away to defense contractors where it could have been spent, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SANDERS] mentioned earlier, for worthwhile projects within the United States to help our economy.

The purpose of this amendment is to cut $700 million more from this project. We know from sources within the Department of Defense that this cut will not jeopardize the future of this program for the real threats against the United States 10 years from now.

I might also say, Mr. Chairman, that in the past several weeks we have heard speech after speech on the floor of the House about the deficit. This is a specific opportunity for Members of this House to cast a vote that will reduce this deficit by $700 million.

Last night the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], my friend and colleague, offered an amendment to cut a $15 million parking garage in Newark, NJ. He predicted that unless we took steps like that, we would face, in his words, economic chaos in the United States. I invite my colleague and all of the 89 who supported his amendment to join us today in this amendment for some $700 million in cuts.

I know my colleague from Indiana will be saddened, and may be surprised, to learn that only nine Members who voted to cut the Newark parking garage voted 2 weeks ago to cut $1 million out of star wars. Please take that budget balancing fervor away from parking garages, and put it where it counts. We are talking about $700 million which could be saved here.

Let me also suggest to the gentleman and others who are in the Chamber that I have taken a look at the cosponsors of the balanced budget amendment, only 57 voted to cut $1 million out of the star wars program.

I took a look at the vote 2 days ago to cut agricultural research programs, literally pennies being spent so that we can have the food and fiber our Nation needs, and I was shocked to learn that out of the 129 Members who voted to cut agricultural research, only 19 voted to cut the star wars program.

Mr. Chairman, I say to my colleagues in the House, "If deficit reduction is your goal, here is your vehicle. We can talk about parking garages until we're blue in the face. We could talk about agricultural research until we have nothing further to say. But if you want to cut real money, start here. This is, in fact, pork barrel of the highest magnitude."

Mr. Chairman, I would urge my colleagues to take that head of steam they had in all these other amendments and apply it to a real program with real savings and cut back on this pork barrel in the Pentagon.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURBIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I and my colleagues DICK DURBIN and BILL GREEN are offering this amendment to reduce appropriations for Defense agencies' research and development by $700 million. The amendment is intended to reduce the funds for SDI without affecting the appropriation for theater missile defense.

This bill appropriates about $3.3 billion for SDI and another $1 billion for theater missile Defense * * * or a total of $4.3 billion for SDI/TMD in fiscal year 1993. This is nearly a 25 percent increase in funding from last year's House-approved level.

With this amendment we are not trying to argue against the merits of the SDI program in general—although clearly with the end of the cold war, there is no urgency for development of SDI systems. Our amendment allows for SDI/TMD funding of about $3.6 billion in fiscal year 1993—which is $300 million more than what the Congressional Budget Office estimated was necessary in fiscal year 1993 to allow for ABM-compliant, single-site deployment by the year 2003.

What we are arguing with this amendment is the fact that there is no urgency to develop and deploy star wars in this decade, and that we cannot afford to fund SDI at levels proposed by the Pentagon and this bill. According to the Congressional Budget Office, the Pentagon's SDI plan—which calls for deployment of an ABM system by 1997—would require an average of about $8 billion per year between fiscal year 1994 and 1997. Proponents of the Pentagon's SDI plan—many of them supporters of the balanced budget amendment—have not been able to explain to us and the American people how we are going to afford the pricetag of the Pentagon's plan. The fact is * * * we really can't afford this type of accelerated program.

Please support the Penny-Durbin-Green amendment.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, do I have any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DURBIN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to close my comments by saying, "If you voted to cut the Newark parking garage, a $15 million project, come on down. We got $700 million in cuts here. If you voted to cut agricultural research, come on down. We've got $700 million in deficit reduction for you here. If you're a balanced budget amendment warrior who stood up and made speeches about how we have to get serious, come on down. This is where we're making the cuts. And if you're one of those people who believes that the Pentagon should not be exempt from cuts in programs that are no longer necessary, we need your vote today in support of the Penny-Durbin amendment."

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Let me say the vote was already taken on this in the authorization bill. It is clear it failed by a large number. Let us just vote this amendment and get on with the business because I do not think we need to go into great detail. It is clear what the House has already said. I do not think any of the votes have changed.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose the amendment and would ask that we restrain ourselves, as strong as we feel about this, and go forward with the vote.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I just real briefly want to say that I was the author of the cut, a $15 million cut, in Newark's garage last night. The fact of the matter is this bill is $17.4 billion less than in fiscal year 1992. We do not know what is going to happen in the Soviet Union. We do need to be prepared for any eventuality, and I think this would be an unwise cut, and it cannot, in my opinion, be considered pork when we are talking about the defense of this Nation.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I would ask that the Members cooperate, that we just move it along to a vote.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to rise to associate myself with the comments of the committee chairman and the ranking member. I think they have done an outstanding job on this very difficult job of controlling the growth, actually the decrease in funding, for our national defense.

I want to also thank this committee for its leadership in one of the major assets, not just for our military, but for this country in terms of international competition, the V-22 Osprey. As I related to both the committee chairman and the ranking member, as well as the acting chairman in the seat, I just returned from a meeting at the Pentagon where Secretary of Defense Dick Cheney has announced that he is, in fact, changing his decision and is now willing to go along with the Congress in continuing the 2-year program that we have established to build the V-22. I say to the gentleman, "That action would not have taken place without your leadership, Mr. Chairman, on the civilian side, without the leadership of Congressman JACK MURTHA who has been a real stalwart in this program, and JOE MCDADE, and all the other Members who are involved with this Appropriations Subcommittee, as well as the Armed Services Committee. On behalf of the 200-plus Members who signed the letter in this body to support this program, I thank all of you. We can now move ahead, and the botton line beneficiaries will be the Marine Corps, the Special Forces, and our civilian technology."

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment to cut SDI funding.

Mr. Chairman, star wars began in 1983 as a fictional x-ray laser the size of any executive desk." By 1987 it was supposed to protect the American people from all the ICBM's the Soviets could throw at us.

Well, here we are in 1992, and guess what? We have spent almost $30 billion on star wars, and we have not even built R2D2.

The x-ray laser never shot down a fly. It is a complete technical failure.

And Soviet ICBM's are going away while, somehow SDI keeps chugging along. The technology may fail and the requirement may vanish, but SDI is still the biggest single item in the Defense budget, soaking up taxpayer's dollars like a sponge.

Now star wars is supposed to defend us against Third World ICBM's.

But guess what?

The Third World does not have any ICBM's. And it is not likely to get any.

For Qadhafi and his ilk, using an ICBM to deliver a nuke to the United States would be an act of absolute stupidity.

ICBM's are expensive. They are high-technology, harder to build than a nuclear warhead. They tend to not work at first. They are visible and vulnerable; they invite the United States to take them out before they are set up. And if Qadhafi shoots an ICBM at us, he will be sending his calling card, telling us where to retaliate.

No, my friends, if Qadhafi wants to nuke us, the way to do it is to smuggle his weapon in a suitcase in the hold of a ship. That delivery method is cheap. It's reliable, low-technology. And it doesn't advertise its existence or identify its origin.

SDI is an expensive solution to an ICBM threat we don't have. It's irrelevant to the suitcase bomb, the threat we may have. SDI is a budgetary monster without a mission. Let's put it to sleep.

Mr. KYL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Durbin-Penny amendment which would cut $700 million from the strategic defense initiative [SDI] program—a program which has already been reduced by $1.1 billion.

The Defense Appropriations Subcommittee and the Armed Services Committee arrived at the funding level for strategic defense programs—$3.2 billion—by carefully evaluating the priorities within the defense budget. The sponsors of this amendment have never sat through an Armed Services hearing on the threat of ballistic missiles and yet they assert with confidence that "a $700 million cut will not hurt." Moreover, in a "Dear Colleague" issued today, the sponsors of this amendment argued that "They are not trying to argue against the merits of the SDI program in general." What is the purpose of this amendment? It appears to me to be arbitrary attack on one of the President's highest defense priorities.

I usually join Mr. PENNY in his attempt as a pork buster to cut the fat. However, this time I must strongly disagree with him. I regret that Mr. PENNY has joined Mr. DURBIN on this amendment. I know Mr. PENNY does not desire to gut SDI. The majority of the House does not want to gut SDI. But, the Durbin-Penny amendment will do just that.

The Durbin-Penny amendment also does not recognize the very real future threat from proliferation of ballistic missiles throughout the world. The HASC heard testimony from witnesses both inside and outside the administration which were in agreement that proliferation is a problem. Some critics of the SDI program have chosen to focus only on the direct threat to CONUS and to pretend that the Scud will be the only ballistic missile threat in the future. I believe this approach is naive. Director of Central Intelligence, Robert Gates, stated before this committee that proliferation of ballistic missiles in the Third World is of "grave concern" and his "number one priority."

Further, this amendment does not take into account the positive results accomplished during the recent summit between Presidents Yeltsin and Bush. The Presidents agreed that their two nations should work together with allies and other interested states in developing a concept for a global protection system as part of an overall strategy regarding the proliferation of ballistic missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

The Presidents also agreed to start work without delay to develop the concept for global protection and to explore the potential for sharing early warning information and the potential for cooperation in developing ballistic missile defense capabilities and technologies.

The Durbin-Penny amendment sabotages that effort before it is started. Can't we take yes for an answer?

The Durbin-Penny amendment is behind the times and will severely affect all strategic defense programs. Vote "no" on the Durbin-Penny amendment.

Mr. GREEN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Representatives PENNY and DURBIN, in offering this amendment to cut $700 million from the strategic defense initiative. Our amendment, while reducing funds for SDI, does not affect funding for theater missile defenses.

H.R. 5504, like the authorization bill approved by the House, provides $4.3 billion for SDI, including $2.1 billion for a limited defense system, and $1.1 billion for theater defenses. Just last year, Congress approved a record high total of $4.15 billion for SDI—a $1 billion increase from the previous year.

In this time of unprecedented budget deficits, the continued increased level of SDI spending makes no sense. And, if one listens to the Pentagon, this level of spending is dangerous from a strategic point of view. Early last month, the Pentagon's top program analyst, Dr. David Chu, said in an internal document that the current SDI plan risks failure by hastily pursuing the development of rocket-powered interceptors and ignoring significant performance tests.

Dr. Chu has recommended that we delay the system's deployment from 1997 until 2003, allowing adequate testing of prototypes. Essentially, Dr. Chu has warned that if we attempt to rush deployment, our system simply will not work. What we are attempting to do with the Penny-Durbin-Green amendment is to slow the program down—to ensure that we have taken the time to do the job right. By accepting the funding cut advocated by the Penny-Durbin-Green amendment, we move the SDI program toward the development of a more effective system that, in the process, saves the American taxpayer substantial money.

In addition to Dr. Chu's concerns, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that a total SDI level of $3.3 billion for 1993 would be sufficient to deploy one land-based battery of interceptors by the turn of the century.

By accepting a cut of $700 million, the total spending level for SDI is $3.6 billion. This brings us down to a more rational and effective level of spending, and I urge my colleagues to support our amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the Penny-Durbin amendment to reduce the level of funding for the strategic defense initiative to $3.6 billion. This seems to me to be an adequate and perhaps generous figure for the program this year.

I would like to address three issues related to the Penny amendment. They are the SDI budget, the schedule for an initial SDI deployment, and the threat of ballistic missile attack.

Let me discuss the budget first. The President submitted an SDI budget of $5.4 billion. This included $4.3 billion for strategic defense research and development and $1.1 billion for R&D on theater missile defense systems. The administration's budget is an outgrowth of last year's Missile Defense Act, which placed the Nation on the path to a rapid deployment of an initial SDI system that would be ground-based and ABM Treaty-complaint. The Missile Defense Act was approved by the Senate after the House had passed its version of the authorization bill and was ultimately included in the final conference report. As a result the House has not really had an opportunity to debate the merits of the Missile Defense Act until now.

The committee-approved SDI funding figure of $4.3 billion includes $3.2 billion for strategic defense and $1.1 billion for theater defense. But, it is important to recognize where the committee made its cuts.

The Defense Appropriations Subcommittee cut the administration request to $4.3 billion by eliminating all funding for the space-based interceptors and trimming the funding for research, support, and futuristic technologies. No funding was cut from the theater missile defense category or from the category that contains most of the money for the accelerated SDI deployment. Both of these categories were fully funded at the administration's requested level.

The Penny amendment of $3.6 billion also fully funds the administration's request for theater defenses, as it should since according to SDIO's own testimony this is the highest missile defense priority facing the nation.

The place where the Penny amendment and the committee position really differ is over how much should be spent in fiscal year 1992 to accelerate the deployment of an initial ground-based ABM system as outlined in the Missile Defense Act. The committee cut very little of the funding required to continue the accelerated deployment schedule. The Penny amendment would cut more of this but it would not preclude deployment of an initial ABM Treaty-compliant SDI system.

In my opinion the crash SDI deployment program outlined in the Missile Defense Act, and essentially funded in the committee bill, does not make sense on fiscal grounds, is contrary to sound acquisition practices, and is not required to meet the projected military threat. Some new documents back up my position.

A new report by the Congressional Budget Office makes it clear that we do not need to spend $4.3 billion on SDI in fiscal year 1993 unless we want an accelerated deployment. CBO states in its report that a level of $3.3 billion in fiscal year 1993 will be sufficient to move SDI research and development forward and allow for the deployment of a fully tested and operationally capable ABM system by the year 2003. The Penny amendment provides even more funding than this.

Fully testing the system before deployment will help keep cost growth down. However, in order to meet the accelerated deployment deadline SDIO will have to forgo much of the usual test program. Mr. Cooper has stated to the Senate Armed Services Committee that to meet a 1997 deployment deadline is "a major challenge with high concurrency and attendant high risk." Concurrency means that testing and production are completed simultaneously rather than in a sequence that allows the problems discovered during the test program to be ironed out before the system enters production. A 1988 report by the Congressional Budget Office on weapon system concurrency pointed out that, on average, high concurrency weapon programs experience cost growth increases of 288 percent.

Let me also add that according to Mr. Cooper's own testimony before the Senate, even if we spend massively to meet an accelerated SDI deployment deadline the Nation will not be protected from ballistic missile attack by 1997 because the initial site will not be fully operational until the year 2000. Even then, because we will have rushed the deployment of the system, it will require extensive and expensive retrofits to improve its capability.

The schedule risk and cost growth imposed by the accelerated SDI deployment schedule is even causing concern within the Department of Defense, as was emphasized in an analysis written by the Secretary of Defense's top weapon watchdog in which he states that the plan "is almost certain to suffer early significant cost growth and schedule slippage" and that pushing ahead with rush deployment of the interceptors and skipping important performance tests risks system failure. The DOD analysis suggests that the goal for an ABM deployment should be the year 2003 because this much time is required to fully test and evaluate the system so we can have high confidence that it will work once deployed.

The Penny amendment would allow us to fund the SDI program at a level that would allow for this necessary testing and deployment of this fully tested system in 2003, if such a system was needed given the status of the threat to our nation.

And, there are two major categories of threat that we need to be concerned with. First, there is the threat of an accidental or unauthorized launch from the former Soviet Union. Second is the development of a long-range ballistic missile by a Third World nation that may be hostile to us.

The threat of an accidental or unauthorized launch of a long-range missile against the United States from the former Soviet Union is of concern, but it is very unlikely as long as the leaders of the Commonwealth of Independent States [CIS] maintain strong control over their arsenals—as they have during the ten months since the coup. Defense Secretary Cheney just last week testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that he saw "no diminution" of control over the long-range nuclear weapons of the CIS. This is a position that has been reiterated by the President and the Director of the CIA as well. In my opinion, there's no need to accelerate deployment to meet this threat.

Regarding the Third World threat, the Director of the CIA, Robert Gates, testified before the Congress earlier this year that beyond China and the CIS, the CIA does not expect new long-range missile threats to the United States to appear for at least another decade. That means not before 2003. The Penny amendment meets this goal.

Mr. Chairman, the fiscal condition of our Nation is too deteriorated to spend more than is necessary on any federally funded program. If we pace our expenditures to the threat, and fully test the SDI system elements, we can make significant yearly savings in the SDI budget. And we will be able to deploy an operationally effective ABM system by 2003 if such a system is needed. This approach makes sense from both a fiscal and security standpoint. This approach is embodied in the Penny amendment. I hope that my colleagues will join me in supporting it.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 201, noes 217, not voting 16, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mrs. Collins of Illinois for, with Mr. Ballenger against.

Messrs. COUGHLIN, PETRI, COBLE, and SMITH of Texas changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the report which explains this bill establishes for the first time the intent of the Congress with regard to the recommendation of the 1991 Base Closure and Realignment Commission to close the airfield at MacDill Air Force Base and to relocate the Joint Communications Support Element which is currently based there. The stated intent is for the Department to delay the implementation of that portion of the recommendation and to reconsider that decision as it would affect the needs of the two commands which will remain there when the Air Force relocates its F-16 fighter training wing.

As a member of both the Defense Subcommittee and the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, I am very familiar with the very unique and highly classified elements of the Special Operations Command and the Central Command which are both headquartered at MacDill. So when the Base Closure Commission recommended the closure of the airfield, I knew that facility was essential to the missions of those commands and I began to make a case for retaining the air operations.

Just after Desert Storm and just before he retired as commander in chief of Central Command, I discussed this matter with Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf at his appearance before the Intelligence Committee. He confirmed my assertion that the airfield was essential to his mission.

At a hearing on the needs of the Special Operations Command before the Defense Subcommittee, I asked Gen. Carl Stiner, the commander in chief of the Special Operations Command, if his headquarters could function at a facility that does not have aviation capability? He said "It would be very, very difficult because you have two major headquarters at MacDill and they are going to remain there."

And during a hearing on March 4, of this year, I asked the current commander in chief of the Central Command, Gen. Joseph Hoar, how he felt about keeping the airfield open. He said, "Carl Stiner and I, the commander of the Special Operations Command, signed a joint letter to the chairman asking him to reconsider with respect to keeping the airfield open. We feel that for operational reasons for both commands, it is very important."

He went on to say, "in my judgment, it is very worthwhile to keep that airfield open."

So, Mr. Chairman, with this testimony and with a body of evidence which cannot be discussed in this forum because of its national security classification, the committee has included strong language about its concerns with regard to keeping the MacDill airfield open and retaining the Joint Communications Support Element there in the report which accompanies this bill. I will insert that portion of the report in the RECORD.

MACDILL AIR FORCE BASE AIRFIELD OPERATIONS

MacDill Air Force Base is the home of the Central Command, the Special Operations Command, the Joint Communications Support Element and the Air Force's 56th Tactical Fighter Training wing. The 1991 Base Closure Commission initially recommended the realignment of the fighter training wing and Joint Communications Support Element to other locations and the closure of the airfield, but decided to keep the Base open after becoming convinced it would be far too expensive to relocate Central Command and/or the Special Operations Command. Both the Commander in Chiefs (CINCs) of the Central Command and Special Operations Command have testified before the Committee that the aviation activities at MacDill are critical to their mission and that they have recommended to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs that the decision to close the airfield be reconsidered.

The Committee has also determined that it would be far too expensive to relocate these two joint commands. In light of the strong testimony from the CINCs that the airfield is essential to their operations the Committee strongly suggests that the Secretary seriously consider options to continue airfield operations to support the missions of CENTCOM and SOCOM, and any other commands or Federal agencies that could be transferred to MacDill AFB area in the future. One such option would be to contract out the airfield operations as a cost effective way to meet CENTCOM and SOCOM requirements. Furthermore, because of the nature of CENTCOM and SOCOM missions, the Department should certainly consider the security risks of deploying CENTCOM and SOCOM units from other than a secure aviation facility. If such an option is feasible, the Committee recommends that funding for the airfield operations and other related costs be included in the budget of the U.S. Special Operations Command.

In view of the testimony before the Committee and the possible unnecessary costs associated with moving ahead with the current plans, the Committee strongly suggests that the Secretary delay all activity associated with closing the airfield and moving the Joint Communications Support Element until after the next Base Closure and Realignment Commission process commences.

While the Committee still questions the advisability of consolidating the F–16 training mission at Luke Air Force Base because of ground encroachment problems which have developed there since the 1991 Base Closure proceedings, nothing in this report should be interpreted as interfering with those plans.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee to engage in a colloquy on the intent of section 9032, which provides that no CHAMPUS fiscal intermediary contract may be modified to require the fiscal intermediary contract to provide support for managed care unless DOD also solicits competitive at-risk proposals.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PICKETT] is absolutely correct. Section 9032 is designed to address only the future delivery of managed care service in the Tidewater and any similar projects elsewhere.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the Department of Defense has an ongoing relationship with the National Institutes of Health, and it is a cooperation that is vital to the well-being of our armed services. It was actively engaged during Desert Storm and Desert Shield, and the chairman of the committee has been a champion when it comes to women's health in the armed services.

To this end I have fought to provide for some very critical needs and funding for women's health research. I and my colleagues from the women's caucus have fought for $300 million more for breast cancer research, $40 million for osteoporosis research, $75 million for research in cervical and ovarian cancer, some of those neglected areas of research.

It is my understanding that the current levels provided for in this bill would allow the chairman to allocate an additional $500 million to a special DOD account for NIH to help fund these needs in women's health research.

Mr. Chairman, is that correct?

Mr. MURTHA. I would say to the gentlewoman [Ms. OAKAR] who has been in the forefront on these issues, she came to me two days ago, and I certainly agree with her recommendation that this kind of money that is provided for Health and Human Service (HHS) should be used in these areas. I know they have to make their own decisions, but I certainly agree that they need more money in these areas, and the preventive care that these would provide would actually save not only suffering but a lot of money.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, let me thank the gentleman again. I am going to interpret that as a positive answer.

Let me also commend him for not only this issue and for being sensitive about it, but for his efforts to investigate and eliminate sexual harassment and sex-based discrimination in the military. I for one really applaud him for his reaction to the Tailhook incident, and the insensitively of a selective number of the upper echelon and other Navy personnel for ignoring the women who serve this country, who went through the system with their complaints, and somehow now they are being castigated as having something wrong with them because they did not want to be harassed and practically getting raped.

To me it is reminiscent of the way the upper echelon treated Clayton Hardwick, that whole incident, when they blamed a young man and demeaned his reputation for an explosion that we all know was not caused by this dead sailor.

I want to compliment the gentleman. It is not easy to come out right on these issues, and I am glad it came from him.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BURTON OF INDIANA

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. BURTON of Indiana: Page 43, strike out line 22 and all that follows through line 9 on page 44.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I will not make my usual impassioned plea today to cut pork by going into all the sordid details about the budget deficit and the impending economic collapse of the nation if we do not get control of our spending. I think the Members have heard that enough this week. I may bring it up next week again.

Today I want to talk briefly about a project.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief comment?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised that the gentleman would not mention the fact that the Subcommittee on Defense of the Committee on Appropriations has reduced the budget from last year's funding level by $17 billion in budget authority.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If the gentleman had been on the floor earlier, he would have heard me say that.

Mr. DICKS. Then I commend the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in my view this amendment is one of the most blatant pork barrel projects that we have seen come before this body. This is a $10 million no-strings-attached grant to the Edward R. Roybal Foundation in California. According to this bill, this is an unrestricted grant to support the foundation's educational and public service programs for caregivers, practitioners, and educators specializing in applied gerontology.

I do not know what in the world this has to do with the Defense budget and Defense appropriation bill. The report language says that the grant will provide an educational opportunity for individuals adversely affected by personnel reductions in the Department of Defense and defense-related industries. This is a flimsy excuse for diverting defense money to nondefense purposes. This is a back-door attempt to knock down the firewalls between defense and domestic spending.

On March 31, the House overwhelmingly rejected legislation to break down the firewalls by a vote of 238 to 187. If this foundation needs Federal money, it should apply for money through the existing Federal medical research assistance programs, and not through the Defense appropriation bill. We should not be giving a $10 million no-strings-attached grant to a private foundation. This is pure, unadulterated pork.

This grant has not been authorized by the Committee on Armed Services. In fact, the authorizing provision is contained in this appropriation bill, and this was not requested by the administration.

My colleagues know the fiscal problems this country faces. They know about the deficit. They know about the national debt. They have heard what I have said and others have said about the possibility of a real economic calamity if we do not get control of spending. Here is $10 million to a private foundation that is pure unadulterated pork that does not even belong in the Defense appropriations bill, and I hope my colleagues will vote to take it out.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Let me just say to my colleagues I think we really are talking about a very worthwhile foundation that just happens to be named after one of our distinguished Members.

The foundation would offer application of skills to both traditional and older adult students, target individuals adversely affected by drawdown in military and its related industries, offer a credit certificate program in applied gerontology for caregivers and practitioners undergraduate, graduate, and doctoral candidates, involve a partnership between Cal State and L.A. and the surrounding multiethnic community, and the foundation provides scholarships.

So it helps in many ways people who are getting out of the service. We are spending a billion dollars for economic conversion, and we think this should be a part of that bill, and I would ask that we go forward and defeat this amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 218, noes 200, not voting 16, as follows:

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PENNY

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PENNY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise Members that all debate time has expired.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, this is one of three bipartisan amendments which I and my colleagues intend to offer dealing with cold war weapon systems which continue to be funded at very high levels. These amendments will save taxpayers a total of $4.1 billion. This is a chance for Members on both sides of the aisle to vote for significant deficit reduction.

This particular amendment, offered by myself and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. AUCOIN], reduces the Navy weapons procurement account by $787 million—the amount the bill appropriates to procure 17 Trident II, D-5, missiles. As you know, the D-5 missile was developed during the cold war for the Navy as a hard target kill system which could destroy hard targets such as ICBM silos and underground command bunkers in the Soviet Union. The D-5 missile is deployed on the Navy's Trident II submarines.

In February of this year, I introduced legislation to terminate procurement of the D-5 missile after about 275 missiles at the end of fiscal year 1992. Each of these D-5 missiles is capable of carrying 8 nuclear warheads or a total of 2,000 nuclear warheads. With an inventory of 275 D-5 missiles, the Navy could deploy 6 D-5 equipped Trident submarines, with 1,152 warheads, and still have nearly 130 extra D-5 missiles for tests and evaluations.

In February of this year, the Congressional Budget Office reported that just "six D-5 submarines would have more potential to destroy hardened targets than today's entire ballistic missile submarine fleet." With the end of the cold war and the breakup of the Soviet Union, the threat of nuclear war with Russia is extremely remote. In addition, 2 weeks ago, the United States and Russia agreed to sharp reductions in nuclear weapons. The United States is to be limited to 1,728 warheads on strategic submarines, down from the current level of 5,000 warheads. Since the United States already has enough D-5 missiles produced to carry 1,152 nuclear warheads, and since the United States also has an additional 8 trident I, C-4, submarines—deployed with another 1,536 warheads—it seems logical that we do not need to produce any more D-5 missiles.

Before I yield my time, I would like to thank Chairman ASPIN for requesting—on my behalf—that the Congressional Budget Office study the alternatives to continuing with procurement of the D-5 missile. I would also like to thank Chairman MURTHA for already reducing the administration's request for D-5 procurement by four missiles and $200 million. This was an important first step and sends a strong message to the Pentagon that there are implications for the D-5 missile due to the end of the cold war.

I would simply suggest we send an even stronger message to the Pentagon by supporting my amendment and in the process saving the taxpayers this year nearly $787 million.

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KASICH

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9131. Amounts appropriated in this Act for operation and maintenance for the Navy (for the payment of severance pay to foreign nationals employed by the Department of Defense in the Republic of the Philippines) shall be reduced by $52,000,000.

Mr. KASICH (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. AUCOIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to object, but I would like to have some means by which to know on behalf of the membership, if debate time has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will restate the situation.

There are two amendments remaining with time designated under the rule. Those amendments may be offered and debated to the extent provided for in the rule. Other amendments may be offered, but all time for debate has expired. Therefore, other amendments may be offered but not debated.

The gentleman from Oregon has time under a reservation of objection to the unanimous consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Does the gentleman from Oregon yield under his reservation?

Mr. AUCOIN. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, my point is, is it going to be possible for the membership to know when an amendment is offered and somebody asks unanimous consent for the amendment not to be read, and I want to accommodate people who make such a unanimous-consent request. I do not want to object to those things, but is there some way in which the membership can know whether it is an amendment that has been contemplated under the rule?

Second, Mr. Chairman, would it be possible under a unanimous-consent request for Members to at least describe their amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous-consent requests may be made. A Member may reserve the right to object and engage in discussion.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I have to exercise that option, and in this case I would like to have an explanation of the amendment.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I say to the gentleman, what the Chair has suggested, I have an amendment, and if I ask unanimous consent to be able to explain my amendment in one minute, if nobody objects, it could be done. I would think we would be able to achieve that.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I will tell the gentleman, I would not object if that is what other Members have an intent to do, but I would object if there is no such intention.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk will continue the reading of the amendment.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 30 seconds to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, what the amendment does is to conform the appropriations bill with the authorizing bill that stops the payment of $52 million in severance pay to the Filipinos when they threw us out of their country. We do not think we ought to pay this.

I have checked with the chairman and the ranking member.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DORGAN OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

SEC. 9131. The total amount appropriated to or for the use of the Department of Defense by this Act is reduced by $200,000,000 to reflect savings resulting from the decreased use of consulting services by the Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall allocate the amount reduced in the preceding sentence and not later than March 1, 1993, report to the Senate and the House Committees on Appropriations and Armed Services how this reduction was allocated among the Services and Defense Agencies. Provided, That this section does not apply to the reserve components.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] has been printed in the rule, and under the rule, the gentleman from North Dakota is recognized for 10 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 10 minutes.

Is there a Member opposed?

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE] will be recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, under my time I would like to yield for a colloquy to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me, and I would like to engage the chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations in a colloquy concerning the strategic environmental research section of the defense appropriations bill.

Mr. Chairman, the Defense Appropriation's Subcommittee has set aside funds for the National Environmental Waste Technology Testing and Evaluation Center to develop and use new technologies to begin the remediation and cleanup of residual waste.

Mr. Chairman, is it your understanding that any contaminated waste samples will be only the low-toxicity waste currently identified at the DOD sites in Montana with environmental problems as well as other contaminated water sites in the State. Furthermore is it your understanding that any contaminated waste samples be only test samples from the 77 DOD sites in Montana to be shipped back to the originator when testing is completed.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, that is my understanding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his comments, and I thank the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] for yielding.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that the clerk was reading is an amendment that is rather simple.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today to offer an amendment with my colleagues Mr. PENNY and Mrs. BOXER to cut $500 million from the Defense appropriations bill. This cut in funding for excess secondary defense items such as spare parts, clothing, and medical supplies should be affirmed for many reasons:

DOD sells unneeded secondary inventory for a mere 2 percent of actual value. Taxpayers take a 98-percent loss. In 1990, this wasteful practice cost American taxpayers $10 billion.

According to GAO, defense inventory management is one of 16 government activities that are highly vulnerable to mismanagement, fraud, and abuse. GAO recommends a $5 billion cut this year for spending on unneeded items.

Currently, DOD admits having more than $21 billion in unneeded secondary defense inventory on hand. Nonetheless, it was found last year that DOD ordered an additional $2.5 billion in unneeded secondary stockpiles.

A recent audit found that Army units at 13 divisions had $184 million in spares above their needs. Air Force inventories increased by 110 percent between 1987 and 1990. Meanwhile, buying commands continued purchasing these same items they already had in stock.

DOD's own inspector general has acknowledged that the defense supply system is irresponsible, ordering secondary items far above current needs and wholly unrelated to future needs.

The cold war is over. We must take this opportunity to make responsible cuts in our defense spending in order to cut the towering Federal deficit. This amendment is responsible and carefully crafted to make sensible reductions that will not impair defense readiness. This amendment also carries forward findings from the Democratic Caucus Task Force on Government Waste.

In short, there are good, sound reasons to cut $500 million in spending for excess secondary defense items. Our amendment to H.R. 5504 will give every Member a chance to reinforce the House position on this important matter. This is an excellent opportunity for defense savings that will not impair our national security.

SEC. 9131. The total amount appropriated to or for the use of the Department of Defense by this Act is reduced by $500,000,000 to reflect savings with respect to secondary excess inventory items of the Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall allocate the amount reduced in the preceding sentence and not later than March 1, 1993, report to the Senate and the House Committees on Appropriations and Armed Services how this reduction was allocated among the Services and Defense Agencies: Provided, That this section does not apply to the reserve components.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we have tried to stay on top of this excess inventory. As a matter of fact, we took out $1 billion in rescissions earlier this year. We agree something needs to be taken out of it, so we will agree to the amendment. We think that it may be a little bit too much, but we will adjust it in conference.

So, Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY].

Mr. PENNY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I also want to express my appreciation to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for his work with us on this issue. I know that he feels the level of the cut is deeper than can prudently be accommodated, but we feel quite strongly that the inventories have grown significantly over the last number of years and some reduction in the budget for the coming year is in order and would indicate our willingness to continue to work with the chairman to manage this cut appropriately.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, once again this would cut $500 million.

If we have an affirmative voice vote, I would not expect to call for a record vote on this matter.

I would ask those who rose in opposition if they are determined to use the time? If they determine not to, I would yield back the balance of my time, but I would inquire of the gentleman what his intentions are.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, I would urge the gentleman to yield back his time. I have a colleague to whom I need to yield for some comments not directly on point. I know the gentleman is sincere. I do not fully agree, but we expect to accept it on this side.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I will not use the entire amount of time.

I rise to object to the provision in this bill, title IX, section 9115 of the fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill prohibiting funds for the Pentagon to assist in the sale of LTV to Thomson-CSF.

Clearly, while disguised as a limitation on funding, section 9115 constitutes legislation on an appropriations bill and is therefore in violation of clause 2, rule 21 of the House Rules prohibiting such violations of the authorizing committee's jurisdiction.

In this instance the House Armed Services Committee has conducted a series of oversight investigative hearings and is in the process of verifying agency recommendations on the proposed sale of LTV to Thomson-CSF. Accordingly, it clearly is premature and inappropriate at this time for the Defense Appropriations Committee to legislate on this matter before the Armed Services Committee holds its scheduled July 8 conclusory hearings on the proposed bankruptcy purchase transaction. Mr. Chairman, I would move to raise a point of order on section 9115 at this time were such a point of order available to me under the rule bringing this bill to the floor of the House.

As the Rules Committee chose to waive such points of order, I intend to press this matter in the conference and on the conference bill on this issue.

I will not move to strike this section 9115 provision at this time as this issue largely will be mooted by the actions of the House Armed Services Committee having jurisdiction, and by the decision of the President shortly under the Exon-Florio procedures established by the Congress in 1988 for business mergers having national security interests.

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Chairman, we accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN].

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Dorgan-Boxer-Penny amendment to cut $500 million in funding for costly excess defense inventories.

This amendment would not hamper readiness because the cuts would be targeted specifically at excess inventories of such things as spare parts, clothing, and medical supplies. When I say excess, I'm talking about items the armed services don't even need.

This is an area where GAO has identified incredible amounts of waste over the last 20 years in more than 130 reports. And DOD's own inspector general has acknowledged that the defense supply system orders secondary items far above current needs and entirely unrelated to any future needs.

For instance, though DOD acknowledges having $21 billion in unneeded surpluses on hand, it was found last year that an additional $2.5 billion in useless extra inventories were on order.

While Air Force inventories were increasing by 110 percent between 1987 and 1990, buying commands continued to purchase spare parts they already had.

Mr. Chairman, this is clearly an area where we can cut without diminishing readiness. I ask my colleagues to vote for the Dorgan-Boxer-Penny amendment and to cut the fat in excess DOD inventories.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DORGAN OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

SEC. 9131. The total amount appropriated to or for the use of the Department of Defense by this Act is reduced by $500,000,000 to reflect savings with respect to secondary excess inventory items of the Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall allocate the amount reduced in the preceding sentence and not later than March 1, 1993, report to the Senate and the House Committees on Appropriations and Armed Services how this reduction was allocated among the Services and Defense Agencies: Provided, That this section does not apply to the reserve components.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] will be recognized for 10 minutes, and a Member opposed will be recognized for 10 minutes.

Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE] opposed?

Mr. McDADE. I am, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McDADE] will be recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield my self such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to cut $200 million in outside consulting fees from accounts in the fiscal year 1993 Defense appropriations bill. Joining me as cosponsors of the amendment are Representatives BOXER, HORN, and PENNY.

Now that the cold war has ended we should seek prudent reductions in defense spending. But even if we still faced a Soviet adversary we would be obliged to make sure that tax dollars for defense programs are spent wisely.

This amendment attempts to restore some sounder management to the troublesome area of contracted advisory and assistance services [CAAS]. This office is responsible for hiring outside consultants for the Department of Defense. These consultants are hired to provide expert advice to the Pentagon on a variety of issues.

Regrettably, studies by the General Accounting Office [GAO], the Defense Department [DOD] inspector general, and the House Government Operations Committee show widespread waste of funds on outside consultants. Let me, therefore, illustrate the reason why a cut of $200 million is needed.

The administration's request for contracting advisory and assistance services [CAAS] or consulting services for fiscal year 1993 is $1.2 billion, a 1 percent increase over last year.

The Department of Defense inspector general has issued a number of reports since 1986 detailing the management problems and waste associated with DOD's reliance on consultants.

For instance, a February 1991 audit concluded that DOD is contracting out services that should be performed in house. DOD has not determined the cost effectiveness of consultant support. While DOD spent between $2.8 and $5 billion in fiscal year 1987 for CAAS work, the DOD IG determined that 37 to 50 percent could have been saved if the work were done in house—in some cases.

An August 1991 IG report for Congresswoman BOXER found that over $26 million could be saved if consultants used for operational test functions alone were brought in house.

An October 1991 IG report found DOD agencies underreporting CAAS expenditures by $20.4 million in fiscal year 1989 and over $19 million in fiscal year 1990. The underreporting was due to unclear, conflicting and inadequate guidance, and improper interpretation of the definition of CAAS.

Congress should not be voting increases in CAAS funding when we don't know the true extent of expenditures and the IG is telling us we could save money by spending less on outside contractors and bringing the work in house.

The Defense appropriators, like the Armed Services authorizers, reduced the administration's request by $45 million. We can do better. Staff has suggested that an additional $200 million can and should be cut.

So, it's evident that even the Pentagon's own inspector general agrees that CAAS needs reform. Unfortunately, DOD's 1993 budget request for CAAS does not reflect the many audit recommendations to spend less on outside consultants and to better manage the use consultants which are hired.

The Department request for $1.2 billion for 1993—an increase over last year's level—makes no sense. I don't think a program that has been singled out for wasteful spending by the GAO should be increased.

The Appropriations Committee has properly cut the Pentagon request by $45 million. However, the weight of evidence from the many reports I cited prompts me and my colleagues to seek an even deeper reduction.

Again, our amendment will cut an additional $200 million above the $45 million reduction made by the committee. We have drafted our amendment so that the Secretary of Defense will have the ability to allocate the reductions among various defense agencies. The Secretary will then report to the Congress by March 1, 1993, on how the reductions were allocated.

This is a sensible amendment. It reduces waste without harming national defense. It does not reduce spending for essential defense activities. It simply implements recommendations of numerous studies which called for reductions in outside consulting fees.

The amendment insists that the Pentagon trim excessive overhead costs. This was a key recommendation in the report of the Democratic Caucus Task Force on Government Waste, "The Challenge of Sound Management."

I urge my colleagues to support the Dorgan-Boxer-Horn-Penny amendment as a prudent step to reduce excess overhead costs in the Department of Defense.

SEC. 9131. The total amount appropriated to or for the use of the Department of Defense by this Act is reduced by $200,000,000 to reflect savings resulting from the decreased use of consulting services by the Department of Defense. The Secretary of Defense shall allocate the amount reduced in the preceding sentence and not later than March 1, 1993, report to the Senate and the House Committees on Appropriations how this reduction was allocated among the Services and Defense Agencies: Provided, That this section does not apply to the reserve components.

Mr. Chairman, I will yield to my friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY], and to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER]. But before I do that, for purposes of the colloquy, I have been asked to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHAYS].

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHAYS].

Mr. SHAYS. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me on an unrelated matter.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] and myself, I would like to engage the chairman in a brief colloquy.

Mr. Chairman, on June 3, the House passed an amendment offered by Representative BARNEY FRANK and myself to reduce the overall Defense authorization bill by $3.5 billion, with the savings coming either from decreased troop level expenditures overseas or increased payments on the part of the host nations or a combination of the two. The amendment passed by a vote of 220 to 185, and then was passed again.

I would appreciate the distinguished chairman confirming this understanding and explaining where the reductions were made in the appropriations bill to reflect this amendment.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHAYS. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA].

Mr. MURTHA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the leadership of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHAYS] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], which they have taken on this particular issue. There is no question in my mind an awful lot had to be done, and the House agreed with them completely. We want to see a full plan when it comes out of conference. You can be assured we will support it strongly because we think burden sharing is something whose time has come and the United States can no longer bear the burden of protecting the whole world.

So I commend the gentlemen for the work they have done. You can be assured we will act accordingly once you get a plan in place.

Mr. SHAYS. I thank the gentleman and appreciate his good work.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota who is a coauthor, along with the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN], of this amendment.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly an area that needs to be scrubbed. We have identified inspector general studies that have indicated that outside consulting costs 37 to 50 percent more than the same review and analysis done in house. With that differential it seems clear that we should encourage the Department to do more of this without contracting with those outside the Department. This is a $200 million cut in a $1.2 billion expenditure. I think it is reasonable and it is a step in the right direction. I would urge adoption.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that this amendment is quite important because it is going after an area, that many reports have told this Congress, is an area where we can really save money.

A February 1991 audit by the DOD inspector general concluded that DOD is contracting out services that should be performed in house, and it further said that 37 to 50 percent could have been saved in this particular arena if the work were done in house.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to be part of this amendment. I am glad that the chairman is accepting it.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHEUER].

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is utterly preposterous for us to be passing a bill today that increases funding for weapons programs that we have absolutely no need for anymore. For 45 years we spent huge amounts to defend ourselves from the dangerous threat emanating from that Communist giant, the former Soviet Union. But now, that enemy has disappeared into the morning mist, and there is absolutely no reason to continue to spend close to $265 billion on defense each year.

It is absurd that from a peak level of roughly $300 billion annually during the frozen climes of the cold war, now that we have entered into the calm serenity of the post-cold-war era, that we haven't had the brains or the will to reduce that bloated military budget by more than 10 percent.

Mr. Chairman, I support the Penny-Frank-Santorum amendment to delete $2.7 billion in procurement funds for the B–2 bomber and the Penny-Durbin-Green amendment to cut $700 million from the SDI program. Rather than throwing these funds away on unproven weapons systems that no longer have a mission, we should invest these funds in urgent domestic needs such as education, health, infrastructure, and environmental protection. At the very least, we should apply some of these precious billion to deficit reduction.

I continue to be amazed, Mr. Chairman, that the Defense Department and the President—and many in this Congress who voted for the balanced budget amendment—want us to build more B–2 bombers in these times of fiscal straits. We already have procured 15 planes, which will cost taxpayers some $34 billion. We have no earthly need for any more.

The mission they were supposed to fulfill—to make a stealthy intrusion into Soviet airspace and to overwhelm Soviet defenses and to bomb Russian cities and military installations back to the Stone Age—has utterly vanished.

Just last month, Mr. Chairman, Russian President Boris Yeltsin stood before us in this Chamber and received our applause when he pledged that Russia would never fight a war against America. He and the President signed a historic arms-control agreement that will cut both nations' nuclear arsenals by more than 50 percent.

That is why I also support cutting $700 million from the SDI program. Not a scientist alive really believes that the star wars will work against ICBM's and is anything other than a fanciful illusion. Here is another program for which there is no longer any urgent mission, certainly not on the order of $3.5 billion appropriated for it in this bill. Now is the time for us to stand up and be counted as voting for commonsense rationality and financial discipline, not just the empty phrases and sterile platitudes that we heard used to justify the balanced budget amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to consider how many Head Start slots, college student tuitions, elderly Medicare benefits, and how many of those 38 million folks who are totally excluded from our national health care system that one B-2 bomber, costing from a half a trillion to a trillion dollars, could finance. Or to consider how such a sum could be applied toward reducing our deficit, estimated this year to be more than $350 billion.

It is an assault on reason and rationality to squander our resources on these absurdly unnecessary and irrelevant programs now, when our communities and constituents desperately need all the resources we can possibly muster for their benefit.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Missouri [Ms. HORN], who also is a cosponsor of this amendment.

Ms. HORN. Mr. Chairman, our amendment aims to cut $200 million from contracted services for the Department of Defense. Total of $1.2 billion.

Studies conducted by the GAO and the inspector general's office at the Department of Defense have indicated the need for serious reform of contracted advisory and assistance services. The problems with CAAS can be found in one of these audits completed last August by the inspector general. In this report, the inspector general recommended legislative changes, internal controls, and replacing Services contractors with in-House civilian employees to curtail waste within the CAAS program.

It is these recommendations, along with many others completed by the inspector general on CAAS, that brings me to the floor to reduce funding for this program. Even the President agrees this program contains waste. The 1993 budget states the "DOD inspector general report indicates that under some definitions, CAAS may be underreported by several billion dollars." The GAO and the House Armed Services Committee have urged that tighter management controls be placed over contracted advisory and assistance services.

To highlight some of the money wasted on outside consultants by the Department of Defense, the House Government Operations Committee discovered that the strategic defense initiative office hired a consultant in 1991 for $264,000 to issue a report to Congress on SDI. The committee's investigation found that the consultant's report for 1991 took verbatim many of the paragraphs from the same report this same consultant wrote the year before for about the same price.

The committee also discovered that the strategic defense initiative office paid $1 million to a contractor to help it prepare for a single meeting. That's right, a single meeting. For those of us who have consistently voted against SDI, this type of abuse is especially appalling.

Unfortunately, the Department of Defense's 1993 request for CAAS does not heed these recommendations. The Department request for CAAS is $1.2 billion, which represents a 1-percent increase over last year. I do not think a program that has been singled out for wasteful spending by the GAO, the inspector general of the DOD, and the President of the United States should receive a funding increase.

If the Department of Defense is not willing to make the necessary changes to the CAAS program, then it is incumbent upon Congress to make these changes for the Department. I am pleased the House Armed Services Committee recommended and the Defense appropriations acted to cut $45 million from the Department's request for CAAS, but I believe we can cut more from this program. Our amendment simply reduces the funds for CAAS by $200 million, thus forcing it to follow the inspector general's recommendations.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Concluding the discussion on this amendment from this side, Mr. Chairman, I neglected to mention on the past amendment on the inventory issues that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK] played a key role and was a cosponsor.

I also want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCDADE], my friend, and to the chairman, that I understand that it is not pleasant to have a bill come to the floor and have folks suggest additional costs. I recognize that both these gentlemen have done an awfully good job looking in virtually every area for savings and they have achieved a substantial amount of savings in this legislation.

We also appreciate those of our colleagues who have offered this amendment, their consideration of it, and it is not my intention to ask for a recorded vote, assuming that we have an affirmative vote here on the floor of the House, and once again I want to thank both the Chairman and the ranking Member.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MCDADE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM].

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN], but I will do so succinctly.

This week a Member from this side, the gentleman from California [Mr. COX], offered an amendment that would have saved hundreds of thousands of dollars from the GAO. These types of consultants and someone at the Rand Corp. could have done the same thing at a cost of 1 one-thousandth of the price, but the other side of the aisle would not cut their own left arm off, and I would say to the gentleman that wants to cut consultant fees, "Let's do it at the expense of the GAO who's 10 times more expensive."

Mr. MCDADE. Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman on this side of the aisle, and we yield back the balance of our time.

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PENNY

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. PENNY: Page 29, line 10, strike out "$9,427,005,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,740,433,000".

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to describe the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to reduce the Air Force aircraft procurement account by $2.7 billion—the amount that the bill appropriates to purchase four more B-2 bombers.

Members are well aware of the pros and cons of the B-2 bomber as a weapon system—so I will not attempt to address this issue now. The real issue is the fact that the difference between a 15-aircraft B-2 fleet and a 20-aircraft B-2 fleet is $10 billion or about $2 billion per extra B-2 bomber.

For the past 2 years this body has concluded that 15 B-2 bombers was a sufficient number of aircraft considering the end of the cold war and the dissolution of the Soviet Union. This year, some have suggested that we extend the program by five additional aircraft costing an additional $10 billion.

Mr. Chairman, we simply do not have the financial ability to fund these additional four or five B-2 bombers. Our deficit this year will total nearly $350 billion. This deficit is not going to get any better if we do not make the difficult budgetary decisions on the floor of this House—and it certainly won't get any better if we don't make the easy budgetary decisions which my amendment today clearly should be.

I urge Members to vote to take a large step toward a balanced budget. I urge Members to vote for the Penny-Frank amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to respond for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKS. Mr. Chairman, I would just urge my colleagues that this has been a carefully worked out compromise with many of the opponents of the B-2 to end this program at 20 aircraft. That will give us two squadrons of eight. We will not waste a lot of money on unnecessary termination costs.

I think it is an important vote in that the B-2 has extraordinary new conventional capabilities. Do not think of it as a nuclear bomb dropper. It is a conventional weapon that can give us the capabilities of the entire 42 F-117's.

I urge the House to do what it did 2 weeks ago and vote against this amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the Penny amendment to cap the B-2 bomber program at 15 aircraft. This has been the House position for the past few years and I believe that given the dramatic changes in the world it makes great sense today.

Let me say that I am supportive of the reorientation of the B-2's role from primarily a nuclear bomber to a conventional bomber. I am also supportive of having a silver-bullet capability with this very capable aircraft similar to that which we have with the F-117. But, as the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee pointed out in the committee's press release after last year's conference ended, "we can get by with 15 planes for a non-nuclear role."

Given the financial problems that our Nation faces, and other higher priority defense needs that I see, I cannot support spending billions more for five additional B-2's, especially as the committee report notes that "there remains substantial uncertainty about the final costs of the B-2 program."

Cost uncertainty and growth have been the hallmarks of the B-2 program to date. Certainly some of this can be attributed to the Congress which cut back yearly purchases, but recent cost growth, especially in the full-scale development program, is related to problems with the aircraft and with its inability to maintain its flight test program. These problems have been documented by the General Accounting Office.

I also have questions about the ability of the aircraft to meet its low observability specifications. We have invested an enormous amount of taxpayer money in the B-2 to date—over $34 billion. We were asked to provide extremely expensive production quality tooling for the preproduction versions of the B-2 because the stealthiness of the aircraft was paramount. We were kept in the black about the progress of the program for years because the stealth technology was so secretive. And yet, now we are being told that the aircraft may not meet its stealth specifications and that we should buy five more at a cost of almost $10 billion additional dollars over the next 6 years.

As I look at the future security environment that is unfolding, I must be honest and say that I think we can better spend our shrinking Federal dollars on more needed defense systems. For example, we need to build more Navy ships, especially aircraft carriers, that will allow this Nation to project its power abroad. At a time when we are cutting back our forces overseas, a strong naval presence is important to show U.S. commitment to various world regions.

I believe that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PENNY] is proposing a good amendment that will not hurt our national security and will help our Nation's financial situation. I support his effort and I hope my colleagues will join me.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. GEPHARDT) having assumed the chair, Mr. OBERSTAR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5504) making appropriations for the Department of Defense for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 343) and ask for its immediate consideration.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TODAY CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 5260, UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION AMENDMENTS OF 1992

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on the bill H.R. 5260, for its immediate consideration, that all points of order against the conference report or its consideration be waived, and further that the conference report shall be considered as having been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MICHEL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not, other than reaffirm the understanding between my colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] and the gentleman from Peoria, whose word I implicitly trust, but for the benefit of those other Members who want the assurance that since we thought the enterprise zone tax bill would be up first and then unemployment, that we are reversing the order only to accommodate those drafters and the membership in total so that we are not spinning our wheels here.

I certainly would endorse what the chairman has in mind by moving this one first. That was the only reason for having the reservation. Would the gentleman give me that assurance verbally for the rest of the membership?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, we have every intention immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of this conference report to take that up, if it is ready; however, if it is not, it will be taken up as soon as it is ready.

Mr. MICHEL. And I hope that will be immediately following consideration of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

(a) IN GENERAL.—So much of section 402 (relating to taxability of beneficiary of employees' trust) as precedes subsection (g) thereof is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 402. TAXABILITY OF BENEFICIARY OF EMPLOYEES' TRUST.

"(a) TAXABILITY OF BENEFICIARY OF EXEMPT TRUST.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, any amount actually distributed to any distributee by any employees' trust described in section 401(a) which is exempt from tax under section 501(a) shall be taxable to the distributee, in the taxable year of the distributee in which distributed, under section 72 (relating to annuities).

"(b) TAXABILITY OF BENEFICIARY OF NONEXEMPT TRUST.—

"(1) CONTRIBUTIONS.—Contributions to an employees' trust made by an employer during a taxable year of the employer which ends with or within a taxable year of the trust for which the trust is not exempt from tax under section 501(a) shall be included in the gross income of the employee in accordance with section 83 (relating to property transferred in connection with performance of services), except that the value of the employee's interest in the trust shall be substituted for the fair market value of the property for purposes of applying such section.

"(2) DISTRIBUTIONS.—The amount actually distributed or made available to any distributee by any trust described in paragraph (1) shall be taxable to the distributee, in the taxable year in which so distributed or made available, under section 72 (relating to annuities), except that distributions of income of such trust before the annuity starting date (as defined in section 72(c)(4)) shall be included in the gross income of the employee without regard to section 72(e)(5) (relating to amounts not received as annuities).

"(B) FAILURE TO MEET COVERAGE TESTS.—If a trust is not exempt from tax under section 501(a) for any taxable year solely because such trust is part of a plan which fails to meet the requirements of section 401(a)(26) or 410(b), paragraphs (1) and (2) shall not apply by reason of such failure to any employee who was not a highly compensated employee during—

"(i) such taxable year, or

"(C) DESIGNATION WHERE AMOUNT OF DISTRIBUTION EXCEEDS ROLLOVER CONTRIBUTION.—In any case where part or all of the distribution consists of property other than money—

"(i) the portion of the money or other property which is to be treated as attributable to amounts not included in gross income, and

"(ii) the portion of the money or other property which is to be treated as included in the rollover contribution,

"(10) DENIAL OF AVERAGING FOR SUBSEQUENT DISTRIBUTIONS.—If paragraph (1) applies to any distribution paid to any employee, paragraphs (1) and (3) of subsection (d) shall not apply to any distribution (paid after such distribution) of the balance to the credit of the employee under the plan under which the preceding distribution was made (or under any other plan which, under subsection (d)(4)(C), would be aggregated with such plan).

"(A) SEPARATE TAX.—There is hereby imposed a tax (in the amount determined under subparagraph (B)) on a lump sum distribution.

"(B) AMOUNT OF TAX.—The amount of tax imposed by subparagraph (A) for any taxable year is an amount equal to 5 times the tax which would be imposed by subsection (c) of section 1 if the recipient were an individual referred to in such subsection and the taxable income were an amount equal to ⅕ of the excess of—

"(i) the total taxable amount of the lump sum distribution for the taxable year, over

"(ii) the minimum distribution allowance.

"(C) MINIMUM DISTRIBUTION ALLOWANCE.—For purposes of this paragraph, the minimum distribution allowance for any taxable year is an amount equal to—

"(B) BENEFICIARIES.—For purposes of this paragraph, a beneficiary of a trust to which a lump sum distribution is made shall be treated as the recipient of such distribution if the beneficiary is an employee (including an employee within the meaning of section 401(c)(1)) with respect to the plan under which the distribution is made or if the beneficiary is treated as the owner of such trust for purposes of subpart E of part I of subchapter J.

"(C) ANNUITY CONTRACTS.—For purposes of this paragraph, in the case of the distribution of an annuity contract, the taxable amount of such distribution shall be deemed to be the current actuarial value of the contract, determined on the date of such distribution.

Not more than 1 election may be made under this subparagraph by any taxpayer with respect to any employee. No election may be made under this subparagraph by any taxpayer other than an individual, an estate, or a trust. In the case of a lump sum distribution made with respect to an employee to 2 or more trusts, the election under this subparagraph shall be made by the personal representative of the taxpayer.

"(C) AGGREGATION OF CERTAIN TRUSTS AND PLANS.—For purposes of determining the balance to the credit of an employee under subparagraph (A)—

"(6) TREATMENT OF POTENTIAL FUTURE VESTING.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of determining whether any distribution which becomes payable to the recipient on account of the employee's separation from service is a lump sum distribution, the balance to the credit of the employee shall be determined without regard to any increase in vesting which may occur if the employee is reemployed by the employer.

"(B) RECAPTURE IN CERTAIN CASES.—If—

"(i) an amount is treated as a lump sum distribution by reason of subparagraph (A),

"(ii) special lump sum treatment applies to such distribution,

"(A) the aggregate basic pay paid by the United States to such employee for such services, reduced by the amount of such basic pay which was not includible in gross income by reason of being from sources without the United States, bears to

"(B) AMOUNTS ATTRIBUTABLE TO EMPLOYER CONTRIBUTIONS.—For purposes of subsection (a) and section 72, in the case of any lump sum distribution which includes securities of the employer corporation, there shall be excluded from gross income the net unrealized appreciation attributable to that part of the distribution which consists of securities of the employer corporation. JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5260) to extend the emergency unemployment compensation program, to revise the trigger provisions contained in the extended unemployment compensation program, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

I. EXTENSION OF EMERGENCY UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION PROGRAM

1. EXTENSION OF PROGRAM

Present law.—The Federal Emergency Unemployment Compensation (EUC) program was first enacted in November 1991 and amended most recently in February 1992. Under the amendments enacted in February and before June 14, 1992 the EUC program provides 26 or 33 weeks of benefits for most workers who exhaust their regular State benefits depending on unemployment in their States.

States with adjusted insured unemployment rates (AIURs) of at least 5 percent or total unemployment rates (6-month moving average) of at least 9 percent are eligible to pay 33 weeks of benefits. All other States are eligible to pay 26 weeks of benefits. In determining the adjusted insured unemployment rate, the Secretary of Labor is directed to take into account individuals who have exhausted their rights to regular State compensation during the most recent 3 calendar months for which data are available.

House bill.—This provision extends the EUC program and provides 20 or 26 weeks of benefits from June 14, 1992 or the week beginning after the week in which the bill is enacted, whichever is later, until the earlier of: (1) January 1, 1993; or (2) the month after the month in which the National unemployment rate (3-month moving average) falls below 6.5 percent. When either one of these conditions is met, the program begins a three-month phaseout in which the number of weeks available to new claimants falls to 10 or 13 weeks of benefits. At the end of this phaseout period, regular State program exhaustees cannot file new EUC claims.

Senate amendment.—The schedule of benefits enacted in February (33 weeks for workers in high unemployment States and 26 weeks in all other States) will be continued for so long as the seasonally-adjusted national unemployment rate remains at 7 percent or higher. However, if for two consecutive months the national unemployment rate falls below 7 percent, the number of weeks of benefits will be reduced to 15 and 10. The number of weeks of benefits will be further reduced (to 13 and 7 weeks) if, for two consecutive months the national unemployment rate falls below 6.8 percent. The EUC program expires on March 6, 1993. Workers who exhaust regular State benefits after that date will be ineligible for EUC benefits.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment except the number of weeks of benefits available initially would be 20 and 26 instead of 26 and 33, respectively.

2. PHASEOUT OF PROGRAM

Present law.—After June 13, 1992, States are eligible to pay 20 or 13 weeks of benefits. Exhaustees of regular State program benefits after July 4, 1992 are not eligible for EUC benefits. Claimants already receiving benefits for the week ending June 13, 1992 may continue on the program as long as there is no break in their receipt of benefits. If they do not receive benefits in a given week after the week ending June 13, 1992, they may receive no more EUC benefits.

House bill.—Claimants receiving EUC benefits during the last week of March 1993 would have three months in which to receive their remaining benefits. They would not be required to claim the benefits for each consecutive week. After this three-month period, the program would end and no more benefits would be paid.

Senate amendment.—Individuals who began receiving EUC benefits on or before March 6 would be entitled to the full number of weeks of benefits for which they were found eligible. They would not be required to claim the benefits for each consecutive week. No benefits would be payable after June 19, 1993.

If for any week beginning after March 6, 1993, an extended benefit period is activated in a State, individuals claiming benefits for such week and any following weeks are eligible to receive benefits under the EUC or extended benefits program, whichever is greater.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment. Claimants who were disqualified from receiving further EUC benefits because they did not claim benefits in a week between June 13, 1992 and July 5, 1992 would be able to resume receiving EUC benefits they were eligible otherwise.

3. SOURCE OF FUNDS FOR EUC PROGRAM

Present law.—Benefits are fully Federally-funded out of the Extended Unemployment Compensation Account, except for benefits for employees of non-profit and governmental entities, which are paid out of general revenue.

House bill.—Continues present law.

Senate amendment.—The new EUC benefits would be paid out of general revenues. The Secretary of Treasury is required to transfer from the general fund to the extended unemployment account such sums as are necessary to pay these new benefits.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment, modified to also require a transfer of funds to pay for all administrative costs resulting from the enactment of the bill. For budgetary purposes, these administrative costs are classified as direct spending and not discretionary spending.

4. MODIFICATION TO ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

Present law.—(a) The eligibility requirements of the Extended Benefits (EB) program are used in the EUC program. Under the EB program, to be eligible an unemployed worker in his base year (the first four of the last five completed calendar quarters in 47 of the 53 State programs) must have either: (1) worked 20 weeks; (2) earned 40 times his weekly benefit amount; or (3) earned 1.5 times his wages in the quarter in his base year in which he earned the most wages (the "high quarter"). The State is required to provide by law which one of the three foregoing methods of measuring employment and earnings will be used for determining eligibility of all claimants.

(b) If EUC claimants' regular State benefit years expire, they must file new claims for regular State benefits even though they have EUC entitlements remaining under the EUC program.

(c) States are required to collect overpayments of EUC benefits, except if the claimant was without fault and such collection would be contrary to equity and good conscience.

House bill.—(a) The provision changes the conditions under which claimants qualify for EUC from those under the Federal-State Extended Benefits (EB) program to the conditions under the regular State programs. If still unemployed, claimants who were ineligible for EUC under the EB requirements can re-apply for benefits payable for weeks of unemployment on or after the date of enactment.

(b) Effective upon enactment, the provision allows EUC claimants who have exhausted their State benefits years while receiving EUC to choose between continuing on EUC or filing a new claim for regular State benefits.

Those claimants who were required to apply for regular State benefits already may go back to EUC benefits as if they had not been required to re-apply for regular State benefits by the EUC program.

(c) Repayment of overpayments, mistakenly made by some States in violation of the EB employment/wage requirements or the requirement that claimants must file for regular benefits again when their regular State benefit year expires, is waived.

Senate amendment.—(a) In determining EUC and EB eligibility, States may use one or more of the three eligibility criteria that are specified in the Federal EB statute, rather than being required to choose one of the three.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the House bill except for the "20-weeks of work" requirement. It includes the Senate amendment which allows States to use all of the three criteria in determining claimant eligibility.

5. TECHNICAL MODIFICATION FOR REIMBURSABLE EMPLOYERS

Present law.—The EUC program authorizes to be appropriated from the general fund such sums as may be necessary to cover the costs of EUC benefits paid to former employees of nonprofit organizations and State-local governments.

House bill.—The provisions explicitly requires the Secretary of Labor to estimate the amount of benefits paid in each State to former employees of nonprofit organizations and State-local governments that must be charged to the Federal general fund. This would relieve States of the current costly administrative burden of maintaining an accounting of the type of employment on which these benefits were earned.

6. TREATMENT OF PERSIAN GULF RESERVISTS

Present law.—Reservists receive wage credits under the unemployment compensation program for ex-military personnel if they serve 90 continuous days on active duty.

House bill.—The provision adds a special rule which states that if: (1) an individual was receiving regular State benefits, Extended Benefits, or Trade Readjustment Allowances the week in which he was called to active duty in the military reserves; (2) the individual served in response to the Persian Gulf crisis for at least 90 consecutive days; (3) the individual's regular State benefit year expired after he returned from that service; and (4) the individual received regular State benefits at a reduced weekly benefit amount after he returned from that service compared to what he received before he was ordered to active duty; then the individual shall receive a weekly benefit amount from the EUC program equal to what he received during the week in which he was called to active duty in the military reserves.

7. EUC FOR CERTAIN RAILROAD WORKERS

Present law.—Workers in the railroad industry are eligible for a separate unemployment compensation program that provides benefits basically equivalent to those provided under the regular State unemployment compensation programs. Under current law, railroad employees with less than 10 years of service in the railroad industry are not eligible for any extended benefits due to a statutory flaw in the trigger mechanism. However, the unemployment legislation enacted previously to provide emergency unemployment benefits to other workers also provided additional weeks of extended benefits for qualifying railroad workers (P.L. 102-164, P.L. 102-182, P.L. 101-244). These special benefits for railroad workers expire July 4, 1992.

House bill.—Eligible railroad workers may continue to receive benefits through the life of the EUC program.

Senate amendment.—Same as House bill.

8. MODIFY WORK SEARCH RULES FOR AREAS OF HIGH UNEMPLOYMENT

Present law.—Federal rules enacted in 1980 to apply to the Extended Benefits program, and which also apply to EUC, require "systematic and sustained" work search by individuals who are receiving extended benefits. As a result of these rules, workers are frequently required to make repeated contacts with employers each week, even in areas where unemployment is very high and there are very few employers.

House bill.—No provision.

Senate amendment.—The Governor of a State would be allowed to waive the Federal work search rules (and apply State rules instead) in an area that the Governor designates as an area of exceptionally high unemployment. The Secretary of Labor would be authorized to issue regulations providing guidelines for determining the circumstances under which waivers could be granted.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the Senate provision.

II. MODIFICATIONS TO EXTENDED UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION PROGRAM

Unemployed workers are paid up to 26 weeks of regular unemployment benefits financed by State unemployment taxes on employers. In States with high insured unemployment rates, the Extended Benefits (EB) program pays up to 13 weeks of additional benefits to workers who have exhausted their regular State benefits. The EB program is a joint Federal-State program, half of which is financed by Federal unemployment taxes on employers and half by State unemployment taxes.

1. MODIFICATION OF TRIGGER PROVISIONS

Present law.—Currently, the Federal-State Extended Benefits (EB) program is activated to provide up to 13 weeks of benefits in a State when its insured unemployment rate (13-week moving average) is at least 5 percent and 20 percent higher than the average for the corresponding period in the prior two years, or, at State option, is at least 6 percent. Twelve States have not adopted the 6 percent option.

House bill.—The provision revises the EB trigger so that the 13 weeks of EB is activated in a State when its seasonally adjusted total unemployment rate (TUR) (3-month moving average) is at least 6 percent and 10 percent higher than the TUR for the same 3-month period in the first or second preceding year. In addition, 7 more weeks would be available in States with TURs of at least 8 percent that are 10 percent higher than the TUR for the same 3-month period in the first or second preceding year.

In addition, the Committee report on the bill directs the Advisory Council on Unemployment Compensation to study the efficiency and equity of activating the countercyclical EB program on the basis of State unemployment rates. In particular, the Committee was concerned that out-migration from an economically distressed State might make its unemployment rate so low that the EB program would not activate in the State. On the other hand, the Committee also was concerned that the EB program activate in high unemployment States were unemployed workers might have migrated. The Advisory Council should study whether migration patterns should be factored into the trigger mechanism of the EB program and make recommendations when it submits its first report to Congress.

Effective date: October 1, 1993. In the case of any State legislature which has not been in session for at least 30 days between the date of enactment and October 1, 1993, the provision will not be a requirement of the State law before 30 days after the first day on which the State's legislature is in session on or after October 1, 1993.

Senate amendment.—Effective March 7, 1993, States would have the option of using an additional alternative trigger. Under this option, EB benefits would be paid when: (1) the State seasonally adjusted total unemployment rate (TUR) for the most recent 3 months for which data for all States are published is at least 6.5 percent, and that rate is at least 10 percent higher than the State's TUR for the same 3-month period in the first or second preceding year.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment except that, at State option, an additional 7 weeks of benefits may be provided in States with total unemployment rates of at least 8 percent and which meet the 110 percent requirement.

2. REPEAL OF SPECIAL ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS

Present law.—In general, States require regular program claimants to be able to work, to be available for work, and to seek suitable work actively. State administrators have flexibility in administering these requirements, however, to take into account special circumstances. For example, a claimant in a rural community with only one large employer is not likely to be required to re-apply for a job with that employer every week.

Under the Extended Benefits program (EB), benefits may not be paid to an individual in any week of unemployment if: (a) he fails to accept an offer of "suitable work" or he fails to apply for suitable work to which he was referred by the State agency; or (b) he fails to actively seek work, unless: (1) he was issued a summons to appear for jury duty before any court of the United States or any State, or (2) he was hospitalized for treatment of any emergency or a life-threatening condition if such exemptions apply to claimants of regular State benefits and the State chooses to apply them to claimants of EB.

If a claimant is ineligible because of either (a) or (b) above, the claimant is disqualified for the week following the week in which the violation occurred and for each subsequent week until he has been employed for at least 4 weeks and earned at least 4 times his weekly benefit amount.

The term "suitable work" means any work within the claimant's capabilities, except that if the individual furnishes evidence that his prospects for obtaining work in his customary occupation within a reasonably short time period are good, the definition of "suitable work" conforms to State law.

EB may not be denied to a claimant for failure to apply for or accept a suitable job if: (a) the gross pay does not exceed the claimant's weekly benefit amount plus any supplemental benefits payable to him; (b) the position was not offered in writing and was not listed with the State employment service; (c) such failure would not result in a denial of regular State benefits as long as other conditions of the EB program are met; or (d) the job pays wages less than the higher of: (1) the Federal minimum wage, or (2) the applicable State or local minimum wage.

The claimant is treated as actively seeking work if: (a) he has engaged in a systematic and sustained effort to obtain work; and (b) he provides tangible evidence to the State agency that he has engaged in such effort.

The State must provide for referring applicants for EB to any suitable work to which these provisions apply.

No provision of State law which terminates a disqualification of a claimant for regular State benefits because of voluntarily leaving a job, being discharged for misconduct, or refusing suitable work applies to the EB program unless such termination is based on subsequent employment.

Under the EB program, to be eligible an unemployed worker in his base year (the first four of the last five completed calendar quarters in 47 of the 53 State programs) must have either: (1) worked 20 weeks; (2) earned 40 times his weekly benefit amount; or (3) earned 1.5 times his wages in the quarter in this base year in which he earned the most wages (the "high quarter"). The State law must provide which one of the three above methods of measuring employment and earnings shall be used.

House bill.—The provision repeals Federal EB qualification, suitable work, job search, and re-employment requirements. States may apply State requirements instead.

Effective date: October 1, 1993. In the case of any State legislature which has not been in session for at least 30 days between the date of enactment and October 1, 1993, the provision will not be a requirement of the State law before 30 days after the first day on which the State's legislature is in session on or after October 1, 1993.

Senate amendment.—The Governor of a State would be allowed to waive the Federal work search rules (and apply State rules instead) in an area that the Governor designates as an area of exceptionally high unemployment. The Secretary of Labor would be authorized to issue regulations providing guidelines for determining the circumstances under which waivers could be granted.

States may use one or more of the three eligibility criteria that are specified in the Federal EB statute, rather than being required to choose one of the three.

Effective date: Date of enactment.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment which allows States to use one or more of the three criteria in determining claimant eligibility under the "20-weeks of work" requirement. It suspends Federal EB suitable work, job search, and re-employment requirements until January 1, 1995. It requires the Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Compensation to study and make recommendations to the House Committee on Ways and Means and Senate Committee on Finance with respect to whether the suspended provisions should be repealed or revised (including recommendations as to the nature of any such revisions). The report is due prior to February 1, 1994.

3. INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF FEDERAL REIMBURSEMENT

Present law.—The Federal matching rate under the EB program is 50 percent.

House bill.—The provision increases the Federal matching rate to 75 percent.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the House provision.

III. MODIFICATIONS TO FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT TAX

1. MODIFICATIONS TO FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT TAX

Present law.—The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) currently imposes a 6.2 percent gross tax rate on the first $7,000 paid annually by covered employers to each employee. Employers in States with programs approved by the Federal government and with no delinquent Federal loans may credit 5.4 percentage points against the 6.2 percent tax rate, making the minimum net tax rate 0.8 percent. Of the 0.8 percent tax rate, 0.6 percentage point is permanent and 0.2 percentage point is a surtax scheduled to expire at the end of 1996.

In order for employers in a State to be eligible for the full 5.4 percentage point credit, a State also must have a State taxable wage base of at least $7,000. If a State had a lower taxable wage base, its employers would lose the benefit of the 5.4 percentage point credit on the excess of the $7,000 over the State taxable wage base. No State has a taxable wage base set lower than $7,000. As of the beginning of 1992, 38 of the 53 State programs had taxable wage bases exceeding $7,000.

House bill.—The bill reduces the 0.8 percent Federal unemployment tax rate to 0.3 percent in 1995 through 1996 and to 0.25 percent in 1997 and thereafter. The $7,000 Federal unemployment taxable wage base increases in 1995 to the average annual covered wage, estimated by the Congressional Budget Office to be $28,200 in 1995. The taxable wage base would change each year thereafter as the estimate of the average annual covered wage changed.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the House provision.

2. INFORMATION REQUIRED WITH RESPECT TO TAXATION OF UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Present law.—Under the Tax Reform Act of 1986, all unemployment compensation is subject to Federal personal income taxation.

House bill.—The provision requires States to provide information on the taxation of unemployment compensation and the payment of estimated individual income taxes.

Senate amendment.—Same as House bill except for technical differences.

3. MAILING OF CERTAIN INFORMATION PERMITTED

Present law.—Office of Management and Budget (OMB) Circular A-87 requires States to share in the cost of postage if they add material to mailings concerning unemployment compensation even if the mailings do not add to the total cost of the postage.

House bill.—The provision would allow States to include information on the Earned Income Credit (EIC) in their Form 1099-G mailings to workers who have received unemployment benefits at no cost as long as the additional information does not increase the postage cost of the mailing.

Senate amendment.—Same as House bill.

Conference Agreement.—The conference agreement follows the House bill and the Senate amendment.

4. EXTENSION OF EXISTING TREATMENT OF CERTAIN AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Present law.—Agricultural labor performed before January 1, 1993 by an individual who is an alien admitted to the United States to perform agricultural labor under sections 214(c) and 101(a)(15)(H) of the Immigration and Nationality Act is excluded from coverage under the Federal Unemployment Tax Act.

House bill.—The provision would extend current law for two years until January 1, 1995 and require the Federal Advisory Council on Unemployment Compensation to study the impact of the provision and report to the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Committee on Finance by February 1, 1994.

Senate amendment.—The provision extends the present law treatment of certain Agricultural workers permanently.

5. EXTENSION OF PERIOD FOR REPAYMENT OF FEDERAL LOANS TO STATE UNEMPLOYMENT FUNDS

Present law.—Employers in States with overdue Federal loans are subject to increases in their Federal unemployment tax rate stemming from automatic decreases in their Federal unemployment tax credit of 5.4 percentage points against the current gross tax rate of 6.2 percent. Interest is charged on loans that are not repaid by the end of the fiscal year in which they are obtained.

States with outstanding unemployment loans from the Federal government must repay them fully by November 10 of the calendar year in which the second consecutive January first passes with the State still having an outstanding loan. This means that the State has about a two- to three-year grace period to repay the loan without penalty taxes, depending on when it obtained the loan. If it does not repay fully by the appropriate November 10, employers in the State are subject to annual credit decreases beginning with the preceding January 1 until the loan is repaid fully. Employers must pay the additional taxes resulting from the credit decrease no later than January 31 of the next calendar year.

The credit reduction is at least 0.3 percentage point per year beginning with the calendar year in which the second consecutive January first passes during which the loan is outstanding. There are two potential additional credit decreases during ensuing calendar years in which a State has an outstanding advance: (1) in the calendar years after the third and fourth consecutive January firsts pass, the employers in the State face a decrease by the amount that 2.7 percent exceeds the State's average tax rate on taxable wages in the calendar year to which the decrease applies; (2) in the calendar years in which the fifth through ninth consecutive January firsts pass, the employers face a decrease equal to the higher of the amount in (1) or the amount that the State's 5-year benefit cost rate exceeds the State's average tax rate on taxable wages in the calendar year to which the decrease applies. The 5-year benefit-cost rate is one-fifth of the unemployment benefits paid in the first 5 of the last 6 completed calendar years preceding the calendar year to which the credit decrease applies divided by taxable wages in the last calendar year.

House bill.—The provision extends by one year the grace period for Federal unemployment penalty taxes on employers in States with overdue unemployment loans from the Federal government if the State amended its unemployment insurance law in 1992 or 1993 to increase estimated revenues by at least 25 percent if the first year after enactment of the State legislation.

Effective date: Date of enactment.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

IV. Modification to Regular State Unemployment Compensation Programs

1. TREATMENT OF SHORT-TIME UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION PROGRAMS

Present law.—All funds withdrawn from the unemployment trust fund of a State must be used solely in payment of unemployment compensation, exclusive of administrative expenses and refunds of erroneously paid sums except: (1) certain authorized disability payments; (2) certain "Reed Act" expenses; (3) authorized health insurance costs; and (4) repayments of overpayments. Short-time compensation is not mentioned explicitly.

A provision enacted in 1982 authorizing such programs has expired. (Short-time compensation programs are programs under which States may pay pro rata benefits to individuals who are working less than full time because their employer has a plan approved by the State agency that provides for a reduction in work hours for employees rather than temporary layoffs.)

House bill.—Clarifies that States may continue to pay short-time compensation.

The provision also requires the Secretary of Labor to develop model State legislation, to update it periodically, to provide technical assistance to the States, and to report to Congress on implementation of short-time compensation.

Senate amendment.—Similar to House bill.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the House bill and Senate amendment. Also, language is added providing that eligible employees may participate in employer-sponsored training programs to enhance job skills if such programs have been approved by the State agency.

2. BENEFIT INFORMATION REQUIREMENTS

Present law.—No provision.

House bill.—The provision requires employers to give each worker whose employment relationship with the employer is terminated such written information on unemployment insurance eligibility and benefits as is provided by the State agency. Employers must post at places readily accessible to employees such printed statements regarding benefit rights as prescribed by the State agency.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the House provision.

V. Financing Provisions

1. EXTENSION OF PHASEOUT OF PERSONAL EXEMPTIONS

Present law.—Present law permits a personal exemption deduction from gross income for an individual, the individual's spouse, and each dependent. For 1992, the amount of this deduction is $2,300 for each exemption claimed. This exemption amount is adjusted for inflation. The deduction for personal exemptions is phased out for taxpayers with adjusted gross income (AGI) above a threshold amount (indexed for inflation), which is based on filing status. For 1992, the threshold amounts are $157,900 for married taxpayers filing joint returns, $78,950 for married taxpayers filing separate returns, $131,550 for unmarried taxpayers filing as head of household, and $105,250 for unmarried taxpayers filing as single.

The total amount of exemptions which may be claimed by a taxpayer is reduced by 2 percent for each $2,500 (or portion thereof) by which the taxpayer's AGI exceeds the applicable threshold (the phaseout rate is 4 percent for married taxpayers filing separate returns). Thus, the personal exemptions claimed are phased out over a $122,500 range, beginning at the applicable threshold.

This provision does not apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1995.

House bill.—The bill delays the expiration date for the personal exemption phaseout applicable to higher-income individuals for two years. Under this provision, the phaseout of personal exemptions will not apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1997.

Effective date: The provision is effective for taxable years beginning in 1996 and 1997.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the House bill with the modification that the expiration of the personal exemption phaseout is delayed for one year. Under the conference agreement, the phaseout of personal exemptions will not apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1996.

2. DISALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION FOR CERTAIN EMPLOYEE REMUNERATION IN EXCESS OF $1,000,000

Present law.—Under present law, a deduction is allowed in computing Federal income tax liability for ordinary and necessary expenses paid or incurred during the taxable year in carrying on a trade or business, including a reasonable allowance for salaries or other compensation for personal services actually rendered.

House bill.—For purposes of the regular income tax and the alternative minimum tax, the otherwise allowable deduction for compensation with respect to a covered employee is limited to no more than $1 million per year. A covered employee means any employee of the taxpayer who is an officer of the taxpayer, other than an employee-owner of a personal service corporation.

For purposes of the provision, whether an individual is an officer is determined upon the basis of all the facts. The provision does not apply to payments to partners in a partnership because they are not employees. The provision also does not apply to payments to independent contractors.

The deduction limitation generally applies to all remuneration for services, including cash and the cash value of all remuneration (including benefits) paid in a medium other than cash. The limit does not apply to fringe benefits excludable from income under section 132, meals and lodging furnished on the business premises of the employer that are excludable under section 119, or any payment made to, or on behalf of, an employee or beneficiary (1) from or to a qualified pension, profit-sharing, or annuity plan, or (2) under a simplified employee pension (SEP) or tax-sheltered annuity (other than elective deferrals to such a plan or annuity).

The deduction limitation applies at the time the deduction would otherwise be taken, whether or not the remuneration to which the deduction relates is for service performed during the taxable year.

Effective date: The provision is effective for taxable years beginning on or after January 1, 1992.

For taxable years beginning before the date of enactment of the provision, no additional penalty tax is imposed on a corporation with respect to any underpayment of estimated tax to the extent such underpayment was created or increased by the provision.

Senate amendment—No provision.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the House bill provision.

3. ROLLOVER AND WITHHOLDING ON NONPERIODIC PENSION DISTRIBUTIONS

Present law.—Distributions from tax-qualified pension plans (sec. 401(a)), qualified annuity plant (sec. 403(a)), and tax-sheltered annuities (sec. 403(b)) generally are included in gross income in the year paid or distributed under the rules relating to the taxation of annuities. A total or partial distribution of the balance to the credit of an employee may, under certain circumstances, be rolled over tax free to another plan or annuity or to an individual retirement account (IRA).

For purposes of the rule denying rollover treatment in the case of certain periodic payments, payments made before, with, or after the commencement of the periodic payments are not treated as part of the series of periodic payments.

Income tax withholding on pension distributions is required unless the payee elects not to have withholding apply. If no election is made, tax is withheld from nonperiodic payments at a 10-percent rate, unless the payments are part of a qualified total distribution, in which case tables published by the Internal Revenue Service are used to determine the withholding rate. A qualified total distribution generally is a payment within one year of the entire interest in a plan.

Senate amendment.—Under the Senate amendment, any part of the taxable portion of a distribution from a qualified pension or annuity plan or a tax-sheltered annuity (other than a minimum required distribution) can be rolled over tax free to an IRA or another qualified plan or annuity, unless the distribution is one of a series of substantially equal payments made (1) over the life (or joint life expectancies) of the participant and his or her beneficiary, or (2) over a specified period of 10 years or more.

For purposes of the rule denying rollover treatment in the case of certain periodic payments, a single-sum payment that is not substantially equal to the period payments that is made before, with, or after the commencement of the periodic payments is not treated as one of the series of periodic payments. For example, if an employee receives 30 percent of his or her accrued benefit in the form of single-sum distribution upon retirement with the balance payable in annuity form, the amount of the single-sum distribution can be rolled over.

A qualified retirement or annuity plan must permit participants to elect to have any distribution that is eligible for rollover treatment transferred directly to an eligible transferee plan specified by the participant.

Withholding is imposed at a rate of 20 percent on any distribution that is eligible to be rolled over but that is not transferred directly to an eligible transferee plan. Payees cannot elect to forego withholding with respect to such distributions.

Plan amendments required under the provision do not have to be made before the first plan year beginning on or after January 1, 1994, if the plan is operated in accordance with the provision and the amendment applies retroactively.

The conference agreement provides that the plan administrator must provide a written explanation to a recipient of his or her distribution options (including the direct trustee-to-trustee transfer option) within a reasonable period of time before making an eligible rollover distribution. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to develop a model notice.

The administrator may require that a recipient electing a direct trustee-to-trustee transfer provide adequate information in a timely manner regarding the eligible retirement plan to which the transfer is to be made. The transferor plan and its administrator will not be subject to penalties or liability because of reasonable reliance on such information provided by a recipient, and is not required to independently verify such information. As under the Senate amendment and present law, a qualified retirement plan is not required to accept a direct trustee-to-trustee transfer.

The direct trustee-to-trustee transfer option is considered a distribution option, so that spousal consent and other similar participant and beneficiary protection rules apply. Because a direct transfer generally is considered a distribution from the transferor plan, rights and options available under the transferor plan need not be preserved under the transferee plan.

The conference agreement clarifies that the explicit exclusion from gross income of amounts transferred in a direct trustee-to-trustee transfer in accordance with the provision is not intended to affect the treatment of direct transfers under other provisions of the Code.

Under the conference agreement, in the case of section 403(b) tax-sheltered annuity plans maintained by State and local governments which are prohibited under State law from making direct trustee-to-trustee transfers, the provisions relating to trustee-to-trustee transfers and withholding do not apply to distributions before the earlier of (1) January 1, 1994, or (2) 90 days after the date on which the State law is amended to permit such transfers.

4. MODIFY ESTIMATED TAX PAYMENT RULES FOR LARGE CORPORATIONS

Present law.—A corporation is subject to an addition to tax for any underpayment of estimated tax. For taxable years beginning in 1993, 1994, 1995, and 1996, a corporation does not have an underpayment of estimated tax if it makes four equal timely estimated tax payments that total at least 95 percent of the tax liability shown on the return for the current taxable year. In addition, a corporation may annualize its taxable income and make estimated tax payments based on 95 percent of the tax liability attributable to such annualized income.

For taxable years beginning in 1992, the 95-percent requirement is a 93-percent requirement; the 95-percent requirement becomes a 90-percent requirement for taxable years beginning in 1997 and thereafter.

Senate amendment.—For taxable years beginning after June 30, 1992, and before 1997, the bill requires a large corporation to base its estimated tax payments on 96 percent (rather than 93 or 95 percent) of its current year tax liability, whether such liability is determined on an actual or annualized basis. For taxable years beginning after 1996, the bill requires a large corporation to base its estimated tax payments on 91 percent (rather than 90 percent) of its current year tax liability.

The amendment does not change the present-law availability of the 100 percent of last year's liability safe harbor for large or small corporations.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the Senate amendment with the following modification. For taxable years beginning after June 30, 1992, and before 1997, the conference agreement requires a large corporation to base its estimated tax payments on 97 percent (rather 96 percent as under the Senate amendment) of its current year tax liability, whether such liability is determined on an actual or annualized basis.

5. TAXABLE YEAR ELECTION FOR PARTNERSHIPS, S CORPORATIONS, AND PERSONAL SERVICE CORPORATIONS

Present law.—A partnership is generally required for Federal income tax purposes to use the taxable year that is used by a majority of its partners. An S corporation or a personal service corporation is generally required for Federal income tax purposes to use the calendar year as its taxable year.

A partnership, S corporation, or personal service corporation, however, may elect to use a taxable year other than the required taxable year. In the case of a partnership, S Corporation, or personal service corporation that is adopting a taxable year or changing a taxable year, the taxable year that may be elected generally may not result in a deferral period of more than three months.

Senate amendment.—A partnership, S corporation, or personal service corporation is allowed to elect any taxable year without regard to the length of the deferral period of the taxable year elected if the annual financial statements (if any) of the entity used for credit purposes or provided to the partners, shareholders, or other proprietors of the entity cover the same period as the taxable year elected.

The provision increases the amount of the required payment that must be made by a partnership or S corporation that elects a taxable year other than the required taxable year (including any partnership or S corporation that has an election in effect on the date of enactment of the provision) and requires an additional required payment for any taxable year that a partnership or S corporation first makes a taxable year election or changes a taxable year election to increase the deferral period.

The provision also increases the minimum distribution requirement that must be satisfied by a personal service corporation that elects a taxable year other than the required taxable year (including a personal service corporation that has an election in effect on the date of enactment of the provision).

Effective date: The provision applies to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1991.

6. MARKET-TO-MARKET ACCOUNTING METHOD FOR DEALERS IN SECURITIES

Present law.—A taxpayer that is a dealer in securities is required for Federal income tax purposes to maintain an inventory of securities held for sale to customers. A dealer in securities is allowed for Federal income tax purposes to determine (or value) the inventory of securities held for sale based on: (1) the cost of the securities; (2) the lower of the cost or market value of the securities; or (3) the market value of the securities.

For financial accounting purposes, the inventory of securities generally is determined based on market value.

House bill.—No provision.

Senate amendment.—The provision requires certain securities that are held by a dealer in securities to be market to market for Federal income tax purposes.

For these purposes, a dealer in securities is defined as any taxpayer that either (1) regularly purchases securities from, or sells securities to, customers in the ordinary course of a trade or business, or (2) regularly offers to enter into, assume, offset, assign, or otherwise terminate positions in securities with customers in the ordinary course of a trade or business.

A security is defined as: (1) any share of stock in a corporation; (2) any partnership or beneficial ownership interest in a widely held or publicly trade partnership or trust; (3) any note, bond, debenture, or other evidence of indebtedness; (4) any interest rate, currency, or equity notional principal contract; and (5) any evidence of an interest in, or any derivative financial instrument in, a security described in (1) through (4) above or any currency, including any option, forward contract, short position, or any similar financial instrument in such a security or currency.

In addition, a security is defined to include any position if: (1) the position is not a security described in the preceding paragraph; (2) the position is a hedge with respect to a security described in the preceding paragraph; and (3) before the close of the day on which the position was acquired (or entered into or such other time as the Treasury Department may specify in regulations), the position is clearly identified in the dealer's records as a hedge with respect to a security described in the preceding paragraph. A security, however, does not include a contract to which section 1256(a) of the Code applies.

Notwithstanding the definition of security, the mark-to-market rules generally do not apply to: (1) any security that is held for investment: (2) any evidence of indebtedness that is acquired (including originated) by a dealer in the ordinary course of a trade or business of the dealer but only if the evidence of indebtedness is not held for sale; (3) any security acquired by a floor specialist (as defined in section 1236(d)(2) in connection with the floor specialist's duties as a specialist on an exchange, but only if the security is one in which the specialist is registered with the exchange; (4) any security which is a hedge with respect to a security that is not subject to the mark-to-market rules; and (5) any security which is a hedge with respect to a position, right to income, or a liability that is not a security in the hands of the taxpayer.

These exceptions to the mark-to-market rules do not apply unless before the close of the day on which the security is acquired, originated, or entered into (or such other time as the Treasury Department may specify in regulations), the security is clearly identified in the dealer's records as being described in one of the exceptions listed in the preceding paragraph.

Effective date: The provision applies to taxable years ending on or after December 31, 1992. The net amount of the section 481(a) adjustment is taken into account ratably over a 10-taxable year period beginning with the first taxable year ending on or after December 31, 1992, to the extent that such amount does not exceed the net amount of the section 481(a) adjustment that would have been determined had the change in method of accounting occurred for the last taxable year beginning before March 20, 1992.

7. TAX TREATMENT OF CERTAIN FSLIC FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Present law.—A taxpayer may claim a deduction for a loss on the sale or other disposition of property only to the extend that the taxpayer's adjusted basis for the property exceeds the amount realized on the disposition and the loss is not compensated for by insurance or otherwise (sec. 165 of the Code). A similar rule applies for purposes of accounting for bad debts.

A special statutory tax rule, enacted in 1981, excluded from a thrift institution's income financial assistance received from the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC), and prohibited a reduction in the tax basis of the thrift institution's assets on account of the receipt of the assistance. Under the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988 (TAMRA), taxpayers generally were required to reduce certain tax attributes by one-half the amount of financial assistance received from the FSLIC pursuant to certain acquisitions of financially troubled thrift institutions occurring after December 31, 1988. These special rules were repealed by FIRREA, but still apply to transactions that occurred before May 10, 1989.

Prior to the enactment of FIRREA, the FSLIC entered into a number of assistance agreements in which it agreed to provide loss protection to acquirers of troubled thrift institutions by compensating them for the difference between the book value and sales proceeds of "covered assets."

As of March 4, 1991, Treasury Department report ("Treasury report") on tax issues relating to the 1988/89 FSLIC transactions concluded that deductions should not be allowed for losses that are reimbursed with exempt FSLIC assistance. The Treasury report states that the Treasury view is expected to be challenged in the courts and recommended that Congress enact clarifying legislation disallowing these deductions.

Senate amendment.—General rule: Any FSLIC assistance with respect to any loss of principal, capital, or similar amount upon the disposition of an asset would be taken into account as compensation for such loss for purposes of section 165 of the Code. Any FSLIC assistance with respect to any debt would be taken into account for purposes of determining whether such debt is worthless (or the extent to which such debt is worthless) and in determining the amount of any addition to a reserve for bad debts.

Financial assistance to which the FIRREA amendments apply: The proposal would not apply to any financial assistance to which the amendments made by section 1401(a)(3) of FIRREA apply.

No inference: No inference would be intended as to prior law or as to the treatment of any item to which this proposal does not apply.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the Senate provision.

8. TRANSFER OF INCOME TAXES ON UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYMENT TRUST FUND

Present law.—Under present law, all unemployment benefits received are included in a taxpayer's gross income. Tax revenues generated by this provision are deposited, along with almost all individual income tax receipts, in the General Fund of the Treasury.

A portion of social security and tier I railroad retirement benefits is includible in gross income. An individual is required to include in gross income the lesser of: (1) 50 percent of the individual's social security or tier I railroad retirement benefits; or (2) 50 percent of the individual's modified adjusted gross income above a specified threshold. Modified adjusted gross income is defined as the sum of 50 percent of the individual's social security or tier I railroad retirement benefits plus otherwise calculated adjusted gross income plus certain tax-exempt interest. The threshold amounts are $32,000 for married taxpayers filing joint returns and $25,000 for unmarried taxpayers.

The Secretary of the Treasury is required to estimate the individual income tax liabilities attributable to the payment of social security and tier I railroad retirement benefits. These proceeds are transferred (credited) quarterly to the Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Trust Fund, the Disability Insurance Trust Fund, or the Railroad Retirement Trust Fund, as appropriate.

House bill.—The bill requires the Secretary of Treasury to estimate the individual income tax liabilities attributable to the receipt of unemployment compensation benefits and transfer the proceeds into the Extended Unemployment Compensation Account of the Unemployment Trust Fund.

Effective date: The provision is effective for all unemployment compensation benefits paid after December 31, 1990.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

9. MODIFICATIONS TO FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT ACCOUNTS

Present law.—Ninety percent of Federal unemployment tax revenues flows into the Employment Security Administration Account (ESSA), which funds the administration of the unemployment insurance and employment services. Ten percent flows into the Extended Unemployment Compensation Account (EUCA), which funds the Extended Benefits (EB) and Emergency Unemployment Compensation (EUC) programs. Each account has a ceiling. The excess over the ceiling flows into the Federal Unemployment Account, which provides loans to insolvent State programs. If all three accounts overflow, the excess flows to the State accounts in proportion to their share of total wages paid Nationwide.

House bill.—The provision changes the flow of Federal unemployment tax revenue into the three Federal accounts such that the administration account receives 80 percent and the Extended Unemployment Compensation Account (EUC) receives 20 percent of the annual revenue. Also, it: authorizes interest-free borrowing between accounts; lowers the ceiling in the loan account from 0.625 percent to 0.125 percent of total annual wages; raises the ceiling on the Extended Unemployment Compensation Account (EUC) from 0.375 percent to 0.625 percent of total annual wages; makes the ceiling changes effective in fiscal year 1994; and retains the current law provision that when all three accounts are full, the excess revenue flows back to the States in proportion to their share of total wages Nationwide.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement follows the House bill with technical changes in the operations of the trust fund accounts. The ceiling in the EUCA would be 0.5% and the ceiling in the FUA would be 0.25 percent.

10. REQUIREMENTS OF DEPOSITS BY FEDERAL AGENCIES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Present law.—No provision.

House bill.—The provision authorizes the Secretary of Treasury to transfer amounts owed to the Federal Employees Compensation Account from amounts otherwise appropriated to such Federal agency if 30 days have passed wince the date on which the Secretary of Labor notified the agency that it was required to deposit such amount.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

11. REPORT ON ALLOCATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE FUNDS

Present law.—The Emergency Unemployment Compensation Act of 1991 authorized a study of the basic method of allocating funds among States for administration of unemployment insurance. The report is due no later than November 17, 1992.

House bill.—The provision changes the due date of the report to December 31, 1994.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

Conference amendment.—No provision.

VI. BUDGETARY TREATMENT

1. TREATMENT UNDER PAY-AS-YOU-GO PROCEDURES

Present law.—New entitlement spending for benefits from the unemployment trust fund is subject to the pay-as-you-go requirements of the Balanced Budget and Deficit Control Act of 1985, as amended. Spending for administration is treated as discretionary spending, and is subject to the domestic discretionary spending caps in the Budget Act.

House bill.—The provision states that any new budget authority, outlays or receipts under its provisions shall not be considered for any purpose under the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985, as amended.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not follow the House provision.

2. EXEMPTION FROM SEQUESTRATION

Present law.—The Federal half of Federal-State Extended Benefits is subject to sequestration.

House bill.—The provision exempts Emergency Unemployment Compensation from sequestration. The Federal share of Extended Benefits would continue to be subject to sequestration.

Senate amendment.—No provision.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement does not include the House provision.

VII. TRADE ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

Present law.—Workers certified for Trade Adjustment Assistance must have had at least 26 weeks of adversely affected employment in the 52 weeks preceding their layoff in order to qualify for weekly Trade Readjustment Allowances (i.e., cash benefits extension of unemployment compensation). Up to 7 weeks of inactive military duty or active duty military service for training are among the types of non-employment which qualify toward the 26-week minimum.

Senate amendment.—The provision designates up to 26 weeks of active duty in reserve status to be "weeks of adversely affected employment" for Trade Readjustment Allowance purpose, effective as of August 1990.

VIII. Extended the U.S. Commission on Interstate Child Support

Present law.—The report of the Commission on Interstate Child Support is due on May 1, 1992, and the Commission is scheduled to expire on July 1, 1992.

Conference agreement.—The conference agreement extends the date for the Commission's report to August 1, 1992, and the date of expiration of the Commission to September 30, 1992.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the previous order of the House, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 5260) to extend the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program, to revise the trigger provisions contained in the extended unemployment compensation program, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks, and include therein extraneous material on the conference report on the bill, H.R. 5260, now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference agreement on H.R. 5260, the Unemployment Compensation Amendments of 1992.

This morning, we again received disappointing, but compelling evidence that the recession is not over. The national unemployment rate rose again last month from 7.5 to 7.8 percent. In human terms, unemployment rose by 470,000 individuals last month to nearly 10 million persons, and payroll employment declined by over 100,000 jobs in June.

Given these disturbing economic conditions, I strongly urge the President to sign this conference report. Congress has done its job. If the President does not sign this conference report, the American public will only grow cynical of government and our collective inability to govern. The conference agreement achieves all the major objectives with respect to permanent reform that I believe are appropriate.

First, the agreement extends the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program through February 1993. The current emergency program is due to expire this Saturday, July 4.

Second, the agreement permanently reforms the extended benefits program and coordinates these reforms with the phaseout of the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program next year.

Third, the agreement is fiscally responsible because it is paid for over the 6-year budget period.

Mr. Speaker, most of us support an extension of the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program through the end of the year, but a few stragglers remain in opposition to permanent reform of the extended benefits program. However, after two temporary extensions of emergency unemployment benefits in the current recession and an urgent need for a third, we all should have gotten the message that something is fundamentally broken in the current system that needs to be permanently fixed.

Let me remind my colleagues of what occurred last year. The House of Representatives passed seven unemployment benefit extension bills, three of which became law. Let us not repeat these political sparring matches. They only add to the public's disgust with legislative gridlock. We should not have to enact three separate, emergency extensions of benefits every time there is a recession. Unemployed Americans and their families deserve better than that.

Mr. Speaker, this conference agreement would spend about $5.4 billion over the next 6 years and is paid for in full with $5.5 billion in revenue. I have today received a letter from Richard Darman, Director of the Office of Management and Budget, which I will include in the RECORD. In this letter, Mr. Darman states that according to the OMB estimates of H.R. 5260, and taking into account available pay-go balances, no sequester would be triggered by the enactment of H.R. 5260. Therefore, he requests that H.R. 5260 not include any direct scorekeeping language or any other type of exemption from the requirements of the Budget Enforcement Act.

Mr. Speaker, the bill is financed by three revenue sources, all of which would improve collections or extend existing provisions of law, not raise new taxes. First, collections of corporate estimated taxes would be accelerated. Second, the current-law phaseout of personal exemptions for upper-income individuals would be extended for 1 year. Third, certain pension plan distributions that are not rolled over directly through a trustee would be subject to withholding. This latter provision was initially contained in the Senate bill, and is included in the conference report at the urging of the Senate conferees.

Mr. Speaker, this conference agreement is a good compromise between the House bill and the Senate amendment. It provides needed benefits to millions of unemployed Americans or extends existing provisions without raising new taxes. In light of the sharp increase in the unemployment rate today, I strongly urge the President and all my colleagues to join me in strong support of this vital legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I include the following letter from Richard Darman:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, DC, July 2, 1992.

Hon. DAN ROSTENKOWSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to inform you that, according to our estimates of H.R. 5260, and taking into account available pay-go balances, no sequester would be triggered by enactment of H.R. 5260. Therefore, I respectfully request that H.R. 5260 not include any directed scorekeeping language or any other type of exemption from the requirements of the Budget Enforcement Act.

Thank you.

With best regards.

RICHARD DARMAN,
Director.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that today the Congress will pass, and the President will sign into law, this conference report on unemployment compensation.

However, let me for a moment voice some concerns about the conference agreement we are about to adopt. This is the third time within the past year that we will override the current unemployment compensation system to rush emergency benefits to the long-term unemployed. Our past two efforts will cost taxpayers about $7.8 billion. The conference report before us today will add an additional $5.6 billion through the next 5 years. This is all on top of a system that without any of this additional legislation will spend over $26 billion on regular unemployment benefits this year.

I am fully aware that this recession has been very difficult for many who lost their jobs and who still are without work. The unemployment rate for June, announced today, rose to 7.8 percent. While the needs of the unemployed are urgent, I wonder if their prospects would not be better right now if over the last year we would have put as much effort into enacting legislation to create jobs and expand our economy, as we did into financing unemployment benefits. It is nice to give benefits, but each dollar spent on benefits is a dollar taken away from job creation. I strongly believe it is job creation that should be our foremost policy goal for the unemployed.

In addition to extending the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program this bill reforms the permanent structure of the extended benefits program. This recession has shown us that we need to examine better ways to help the long-term unemployed. I am disappointed, however, that in the name of reform we simply have decided to expand our current system. Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have urged looking into reforms that would provide greater long-term coverage financed by a delay of initial benefits. I believe reforms of this sort, which do not require tax increases, should be given careful consideration.

Instead, we will adopt today extended benefits changes that simply will make benefits easier to get. The price we pay for this is higher taxes that will steal from economic growth.

Let me make a few comments about the financing provisions of this bill.

The bill extends for 1 year, through 1996, a provision adopted in 1990 that phases out the personal exemptions claimed on a tax return as the income of the taxpayer exceeds certain specified levels. The current-law personal exemption of $2,300 is appropriately factored into the Federal tax calculation in determining a taxpayer's ability to pay tax. The personal exemption should be allowed in full, and to extend this unfortunate mistake of the 1990 Budget Act would simply compound the error made 2 years ago.

I note, with significant concern, that the newly mandated pension withholding provisions, at an increased 20 percent rate, could have the effect of depleting retirement savings. Someone receiving a distribution will be able to do a complete rollover only if they can come up with other cash equal to the amount withheld by the Government. For many that will be difficult, if not impossible. While the withholding tax can be avoided through a trustee-to-trustee transfer, the bill specifically indicates that such transfers need not be made available to taxpayers. Moreover, I believe this new provision—which is, in reality, nothing more than an accounting gimmick to speed up revenues—could cause serious administrative problems for plan administrators, pension participants, and the IRS.

The corporate estimated tax threshold increase is another speedup accounting gimmick. We now will penalize corporations that don't hit a 97 percent target. Let me just remind the Members that a year ago we had a 90 percent target. We then went to 95 percent. Today it's 97 percent. Lest the Members think that there is a logical limit of 100 percent on estimated taxes so that we won't have this issue to worry about much longer, it is my sad duty to say that for individuals the Ways and Means Committee recently adopted a 115 percent safe harbor. When will it end?

I may be a lone voice of dissent on this conference report, but I am highly concerned about the revenue provisions of this bill. We do need a strong policy for the unemployed, but its focus should be to expand employment, something which is not done by raising taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], the subcommittee chairman.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is going to sign this unemployment bill for two reasons: Unemployment is up, and his popularity is down.

It is unfortunate that we have had to do three extensions of unemployment in 8 months, but this is the most satisfying for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] who is retiring, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] who has worked on this, along with myself, for the last 3 years.

There are very good reasons beyond just the temporary extension, which is desperately needed, for Members to support this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the reason we have had to be here is because the trigger mechanisms that currently exist in law do not work. The levels of unemployment in the various States have to be so high as to be unrealistic before the existing trigger mechanisms will trigger extended benefits. That is just a complicated way of saying that, when the law was changed last time in 1981, it was done to make sure that fewer people were eligible for unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, we undo that. We take the measure of the total unemployment rate, which is a far more accurate and realistic measure of unemployment in a State, provide a State option for its triggering, and that will be the future way in which unemployment benefits will be triggered.

The second thing that is important: We also change the mechanism for the extension of benefits. Not only is there a 13-week automatic trigger, but, if unemployment is especially high in a State, it can go as high as 20 weeks so we will not have to in the future recessions, my colleagues, continue to amend and change the law in order to provide the benefits for people who richly need and deserve them.

Second, under existing law there are job search requirements for the first 26 weeks which say, "When you claim eligibility for unemployment, you must meet these requirements, but, when you trigger on for the extended benefits, you need to go through a whole new range of requirements." We eliminate that. We try to make sure that the same job search requirements, which are essentially about dignity for people, people who are on unemployment; the vast majority of them want to work, and they do not want to be simply on unemployment; we have fashioned a realistic requirement for them to look for jobs.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, we provide in the temporary extension benefits to people like the workers from PanAm who were laid off, or other aerospace workers in Long Island who have been laid off, or all across the country, 20 to 26 additional weeks of benefits. As I said, most people who are unemployed hate being there. They want to work. They do not like showing up at unemployment offices for checks. Their essential dignity is robbed from them when they are out of work, but until there is work we need to provide the resources so that they can pay the rent, feed their families, pay mortgages, if necessary, and keep life and limb together. Without these weeks of unemployment benefits, Mr. Speaker, families would be in very serious trouble.

Our committee, the Committee on Ways and Means, this Congress, has responded to this crisis three times in the last 6 months. I hope and pray this is the last one, but I also, Mr. Speaker, will urge the President to recognize the plight of ordinary Americans as he contemplates signing this legislation. He has been reluctant to do so in the past, especially reluctant because of the permanent changes made here, and I would say to him, Mr. Speaker, "Please, Mr. President, put aside these concerns. Recognize the need in this land. We are approaching the Fourth of July, Independence Day. Let's make sure that a holiday, not just for the people who are working, but also for the people who are looking for work and who need our help."

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. JOHNSON], a respected member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation and commend the President of the United States, George Bush, for being a true ally of the unemployed. President Bush will have, with this bill, signed three bills to provide extended benefits for those who are suffering the consequences of this long downturn. His understanding of their need is keen. But his commitment to their well-being is deep. The $1 billion he vetoed was a billion that provided, yes, new benefits, but no new funding, and our President understood that to give benefits without the means to pay for them is to heap on our children the debt that is going to destroy them if this Congress cannot get hold of itself.

Mr. Speaker, it is only because of the President's pressure that I can now vote yes on a bill that a few short weeks ago I voted no on, because when this bill came before the Congress last time, it was not funded year by year. It increased that deficit that we keep burdening our children with. Yes, it brought some new money in in years four and five, but after it already spent the money on benefits in year one and two. This is a responsible extended benefits bill because it gives the benefits to people who desperately need them, but it pays for those benefits in the years the money is spent, and I am proud to support it for that reason, and I am proud that my President has the courage to veto the unfunded benefit bill of some time ago and to threaten that action to the irresponsible bill that passed this House some weeks ago.

But I am pleased to support this bill for another reason. This bill does not include a feature that was in the bill some weeks ago when it passed the House that would have increased the wage base on which we levied the tax for unemployment compensation. I opposed that feature because areas of the country like my State, Connecticut, and the Northeast, a high cost of living State, and, yes, a higher than average wage State, would have ended up being really socked by that increase in taxable wage base, and it would have put us at yet another disadvantage in competing with States in other regions of the United States.

So, I am delighted that this bill does not include that provision, but I regret that the concept of reform embodied in this bill is extraordinarily narrow and hostile to the anguish that I see people facing every day of their lives out there, those people who have been on extended benefits and who need these benefits extended. They literally begged me to give them the right to withdraw penalty-free savings that they had in their IRAs and their 401(k) plans. Because so many people mid-career are suffering long-term unemployment; they have kids in college, they have mortgage payments, and after a year and a half of unemployment there are no resources; all they were asking was the right to withdraw their own savings penalty free, and the penalties are steep. I regret that I was turned down by my own committee to allow them that courtesy.

I also regret that I was turned down in my effort to gain for them the right to work half-time without it reducing their unemployment benefit stipend. While I understand the States have that right now, we should have forced their hand to allow these people to work part time in an economy that offers very few options for full-time employment that would support a family.

Nonetheless, though this measure is not adequate to the needs of our people, it does meet the critical need to extend benefits without a break. This will assure folks that certainty, and for that reason I support the bill and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY].

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express strong support for the conference report on the Unemployment Compensation Amendments of 1992.

The June unemployment statistics for the country were released today: Once again, the situation is not good. Unemployment rose by three-tenths of 1 percent for the second month in a row, bringing the Nation to 7.8 percent unemployment. That is the highest it has been in over 8 years. Nearly 10 million people are looking for work. We lost 117,000 jobs last month, mostly in the construction and manufacturing industries. Mr. Speaker, the recession is not over.

This is not the first time my colleagues and I have come to the floor to state the obvious. In fact, this is the third time in 8 months that we have come here to pass a conference report to provide emergency unemployment compensation. This bill would provide up to 33 weeks of benefits for workers who have exhausted regular State benefits. These are crucial benefits for the long-term unemployed across the country.

But Mr. Speaker, the bill before us is more than just an extension of vital Federal emergency benefits. It also repairs the extended benefit system so that in times of crisis, unemployed workers will not have to wait for Congress and the administration to agree on the problem. Extended benefits will automatically be available to the long-term unemployed when a State comes on tough economic times.

Mr. Speaker, we must help the long-term unemployed workers of America who have fallen victim to the recession. Fixing the Extended Benefit Program permanently is long overdue. I urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCGRATH], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MCGRATH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report. I would like to congratulate the chairman and subcommittee chairman, as well as the ranking member, for their earnest work in providing us with this conference report which will extend unemployment benefits through March 1993.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that during the debate on this issue in the Committee on Ways and Means, I came up with a revolutionary idea, and that idea was to pay for the extension of these benefits through the fund from which these benefits were intended to be paid for, the unemployment insurance trust fund.

Right now in this bill and other bills that we have passed in the past few months we have been financing these benefits through either the individual side or the corporate side of the tax ledger. It is high time that we start paying for these benefits through the unemployment insurance trust fund as it was meant to be.

I had the temerity to offer a financing mechanism for a temporary extension which would have indexed the wage base from the present day figure of $7,000 over a 5-year period, which would have brought it up to $8,300, which would have completely financed the extension of these benefits. Until and unless we start financing the benefits from the fund which people have participated in all of these years, we will not have done our job.

So while I applaud this temporary extension of extended benefits, let me say our job is not done until we take a look at the whole issue and start financing this issue out of the unemployment insurance trust fund.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI].

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in very strong support of this conference report. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] deserves the credit of this Chamber and this entire body for his really indefatigable efforts in behalf of the unemployed of America. I think he not only stands for their interim benefits and their emergency benefits as embodied in the bill before us, H.R. 5260, but in the more long range effort to create jobs in America.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] will have a bill coming up later today, and he has other irons in the fire, which create jobs for people. So I want to salute the gentleman for not only taking care of those who are unemployed, but getting down to the root cause of the problem, to create jobs in America, and in Louisville and Jefferson County, KY.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this bill and the work the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] is doing.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SANTORUM]

Mr. SANTORUM. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER] for working together to solve this. I spoke on this bill the last time it was here and I spoke with more than a little bit of outrage as to what I thought was going to happen, which was just another farce of passing a bill that was not paid for that was going to be delayed at the expense of what I saw as suffering people, especially in my district, which has a very high unemployment rate.

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentlemen for putting politics aside and putting the pointing of fingers aside and coming to the floor with a responsible bill that is paid for, that does not again try to throw on future generations the problems of today. We have done that enough in this body.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend both gentlemen for doing that. I rise in support of the measure.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA].

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, today I rise, first of all, to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] for working so hard and showing the leadership and helping the plight of the American workers.

Mr. Speaker, I also rise to express my support for this conference report, which will extend unemployment benefits to American workers and their families.

The economy sinks deeper and deeper into a slump. Unemployment has reached its highest level in 8 years. And for many unemployed Americans and their families, there is no end in sight.

These are hard-working Americans with families to feed and mortgages to pay. These aren't people who are looking for a handout—they want to work. These Americans desperately need the help of their unemployment checks to keep their families afloat.

However, I am disturbed that this bill doesn't bring help to some categories of unemployed Americans who also need help. For some, July 4, when unemployment runs out for millions, it will not be a day for fireworks. It will be a sad day for family meetings to discuss how to pay the mortgage and how to buy groceries. That's no way to enter this holiday season.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE].

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] for the time and leadership on this issue. As always, the gentleman is right on the mark.

Second, I would like to commend the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Resources, who has fought this issue through the Congress several times now in the last 2 years, and without whose tenacity we would probably not be here today announcing to America and to the unemployed workers that they will have an opportunity to get extended benefits. Chairman DOWNEY deserves much, much credit for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, it was 10 years ago this year that I first introduced a bill to try to reform the unemployment compensation system on a permanent basis so we did not always have to rush in during periods of high unemployment, during a recession, and pass emergency stopgap legislation.

This bill, after 10 years of my efforts, does contain permanent reform and it does contain the opportunity for States to get additional weeks of benefits for their workers without further Federal action.

This is not all that I had hoped for. One seldom does get all one hopes for in this body. But it is a significant step forward in rationalizing our unemployment compensation system and making sure that when States encounter periods of high unemployment, they get the assistance, that is, the workers get the assistance when they need it, not several months after they have already exhausted their benefits.

Mr. Speaker, this is a good conference report, and I urge the House to support it.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] has rightfully paid tribute to our chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], who has been adamant that we take action.

He has also paid tribute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], who deserves the plaudits. He has been equally stubborn and very imaginative.

I would like to pay tribute, however, to one person that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE] did not pay tribute to, and that is to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE]. For a number of years he has been issuing the clarion call, "Reform the unemployment system, the extended benefits system, before we get into a deep rut." We did not do that. We got into a deep rut. We were not ready. Tens of thousands of people suffered.

A few years ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE], and I essentially reintroduced a bill to make permanent changes. Again, nothing happened, and again thousands paid a price.

This bill extends benefits. It also takes a step, an important step, toward permanent change in the extended benefit structure, so in the future hopefully thousands of people, laid off through no fault of their own, will not simply be thrown not only into the streets but onto them without any financial underpinning.

I am proud to rise with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], the gentleman from New York [Mr. DOWNEY], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE], people who have worked so hard to say at long last there is a breakthrough. At long last there will be some permanent change. At long last we can look the unemployed straight in the eye and say we not only went through the motions but we did something.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, once again we find ourselves in a situation of having to extend the unemployment benefits, something that none of us really anticipated we would have to do, unfortunately. When we come out of a recession, the last number to improve, and that is the cruelest number of all, is the unemployment number. I think we need at this point to look and see and recognize what can be accomplished for the greatest good when the two parties, the administration and the Congress, cooperate and Democrats and Republicans can come together in this particular manner.

I want to compliment both George Bush, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER], and of course the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] for putting together an earnest bill that they know the President will accept. This is a bill that is finally put in a situation where we are getting out of politics, we are out there trying to help the unemployed, trying to assist them to get back on their feet and to be able to hold their families and their homes together.

I would like to compliment all those involved in being able to work this out. It shows that the greater purpose is to do good and to create better conditions for the people we represent.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS], the chairman of the Committee on Government Operations.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have to change my remarks now, because we had a protracted struggle with the President, who finally relented and allowed us to provide emergency unemployment compensation to the jobless. I was afraid that the President would deny the desperately needed assistance to the unemployed, and that they would have to answer to the American people. Maybe I am being pessimistic, too pessimistic. I am going to hope now, and urge the President and everybody on this side to tell the President to sign this bill.

We have the highest unemployment in 8 years. Among African-Americans, the unemployment rate in the United States is 14.9 percent. I beg the Members to use their common sense, their excellent skill, Republican Congressmen, and urge President Bush to sign this bill without delay.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report for H.R. 5260, the Unemployment Compensation Extension and Reform Act.

Unemployment benefits for millions of Americans are scheduled to expire this weekend, and our national unemployment rate has just jumped to 7.8 percent, the highest level in over 8 years. In May, we had 9.5 million American workers looking for jobs but unable to find them, and now they number 10 million. In spite of the fact that we are being told that the economy is slowly improving, our unemployment picture is worse. Millions of graduates of our high schools, colleges, and universities have just entered the job market, adding to those already searching for work. But there just are not enough jobs for the people who want them.

In California, the unemployment rate rose to 9.5 percent in June, up from 8.7 percent in May. Californians have lost 500,000 jobs in the last 2 years, almost a third of the Nation's total. There are about 1 million Californians who want, but cannot find, work.

This bill, Congress' fifth attempt to extend unemployment benefits to out-of-work Americans, will help lighten the burden for millions of American workers who are still unable to find jobs in the midst of this recession. The President blocked our first two attempts but, last fall, we were finally successful in passing a bill that provided an additional 13 or 20 weeks of unemployment compensation benefits to more than 1 million unemployed Americans who had exhausted their benefits since the beginning of the year. Then, in January, we again extended these benefits by another 13 weeks, providing a total of 33 weeks of extended benefits to high unemployment States—like California—and 26 weeks of benefits in other States.

H.R. 5260 will extend the current emergency program and make permanent improvements in the entire extended benefits system. H.R. 5260 will reform the whole process so that we do not have to go through this exercise each time American workers need help. If H.R. 5260 passes, it will be harder for future Presidents to ignore the needs of thousands of American workers by blocking their extended benefits during economic downturns.

I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support this critical piece of legislation. With so many people out of work, we have a responsibility to act quickly and decisively if we are to give them the assistance they need and deserve.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the conference report to accompany H.R. 5260, the Unemployment Compensation Extension and Reform Act. This legislation is absolutely vital to the millions of American men and women who have become victims of the current recession brought on by a dozen years of Reagan-Bush economic policies. I also want to commend Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI and all the House conferees, who worked long hours to reach agreement with the Senate, and bring this legislation to the floor before the expiration of the current Emergency Benefits Program.

On June 9, when the House first passed this legislation, we had just learned from the Department of Labor that 2.2 million payroll jobs were lost in the United States between June 1990 and January 1992. This number is 32 percent higher than previous administration estimates of job losses in the current recession. In other words, the administration has reported to the American people job loss numbers due to the recession that are one-third lower than the true number of jobs lost in the recession. This report was followed the next day by the Department of Labor's release of the national unemployment figures for the month of May. The unemployment rate in May jumped to 7.5 percent from 7.2 percent in April.

Now, Mr. Speaker, not quite 1 month later, we find that the national unemployment rate, released this morning by the Labor Department, shows another dramatic increase, from 7.5 percent in May to 7.8 percent for the month of June. This is the highest unemployment rate since March 1984, and it represents a full percentage point increase in the last 6 months.

The steadily growing unemployment rate totally invalidates the Bush administration's contention that the recession has ended, that it was a mild recession, and that the economy is now growing. Clearly the recession has been much deeper and more damaging than the President would like to admit, and the dim hope of economic recovery before the November election that President Bush clings to is rapidly fading.

We cannot afford to wait any longer to extend the emergency unemployment benefits program for out-of-work Americans. It is equally as important that we enact permanent changes to the extended benefits program, so as to avoid this charade of repeatedly extending the emergency benefits program every few months because the system is flawed, and simply does not provide the benefits it is designed to provide.

I urge all of my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to join in supporting H.R. 5260, and provide our hard-working American men and women the benefits that they need to keep their homes and families together.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the conference report on H.R. 5260, legislation to extend and reform our Nation's unemployment benefits system.

Today, all across our Nation, millions of Americans are preparing to celebrate the Fourth of July weekend with their families. For many Americans, however, this holiday, like so many before, will hold no reason for celebration, only the continued fear and economic insecurity of an impending expiration of their unemployment benefits.

Mr. Speaker, I wish George Bush understood what unemployed workers and their families in my district have been experiencing. It is obvious he does not. When the President jetted into Michigan last week to host a $1,000 a plate fundraiser, he again criticized this Congress for our country's economic problems and criticized the media for not reporting the great recovery underway in our country. If Mr. Bush had bothered to travel outside his circle of political supporters and fat cat friends, he would have seen the true picture of what is happening in Michigan and in this Nation. The President would have seen people who have worked every day of their lives unable to find even temporary employment and unable to provide for their families. He would have seen single mothers struggling to keep the electricity from being turned off. He would have seen two-income couples trying to make ends meet on one paycheck for yet another month. Most of all he would have seen fear in people's faces—people afraid of their benefits being shut off, afraid of another call from the bill collectors, and afraid most of all that there is no end in sight.

Despite the President's rosy predictions that the economy is getting better, unemployment in the United States rose to 7.8 percent in the month of June, its highest level in 8 years—its highest level since March 1984. The statistics in my State were equally grim. June figures show that the jobless rate in Michigan rose to 8.8 percent—that is, 404,000 people who are still out of work in the face of the Bush recovery.

Mr. Speaker, the President is out of touch. Millions of Americans need our help. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this conference report.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 396, nays 23, not voting 15, as follows:

"(2) TREATMENT WHERE PARTNER IN OTHER PARTNERSHIP.—If a large partnership is a partner in another partnership which is not a large partnership—

"(A) subchapter C of this chapter shall apply to items of such large partnership which are partnership items with respect to such other partnership, but

"SEC. 6241. PARTNER'S RETURN MUST BE CONSISTENT WITH PARTNERSHIP RETURN.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—A partner of any large partnership shall, on the partner's return, treat each partnership item attributable to such partnership in a manner which is consistent with the treatment of such partnership item on the partnership return.

"(b) UNDERPAYMENT DUE TO INCONSISTENT TREATMENT ASSESSED AS MATH ERROR.—Any underpayment of tax by a partner by reason of failing to comply with the requirements of subsection (a) shall be assessed and collected in the same manner as if such underpayment were on account of a mathematical or clerical error appearing on the partner's return. Paragraph (2) of section 6213(b) shall not apply to any assessment of an underpayment referred to in the preceding sentence.

"(c) ADJUSTMENTS NOT TO AFFECT PRIOR YEAR OF PARTNERS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), subsections (a) and (b) shall apply without regard to any adjustment to the partnership item under part II.

"(2) CERTAIN CHANGES IN DISTRIBUTIVE SHARE TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT BY PARTNER.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—To the extent that any adjustment under part II involves a change under section 704 in a partner's distributive share of the amount of any partnership item shown on the partnership return, such adjustment shall be taken into account in applying this title to such partner for the partner's taxable year for which such item was required to be taken into account.

"(B) COORDINATION WITH DEFICIENCY PROCEDURES.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Subchapter B shall not apply to the assessment or collection of any underpayment of tax attributable to an adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A).

"(ii) ADJUSTMENT NOT PRECLUDED.—Notwithstanding any other law or rule of law, nothing in subchapter B (or in any proceeding under subchapter B) shall preclude the assessment or collection of any underpayment of tax (or the allowance of any credit or refund of any overpayment of tax) attributable to an adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A) and such assessment or collection or allowance (or any notice thereof) shall not preclude any notice, proceeding, or determination under subchapter B.

"(C) PERIOD OF LIMITATIONS.—The period for—

"(i) assessing any underpayment of tax, or

"(ii) filing a claim for credit or refund of any overpayment of tax, attributable to an adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A) shall not expire before the close of the period prescribed by section 6248 for making adjustments with respect to the partnership taxable year involved.

"(D) TIERED STRUCTURES.—If the partner referred to in subparagraph (A) is another partnership or an S corporation, the rules of this paragraph shall also apply to persons holding interests in such partnership or S corporation (as the case may be); except that, if such partner is a large partnership, the adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A) shall be taken into account in the manner provided by section 6242.

"(d) ADDITION TO TAX FOR FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH SECTION.—

"For addition to tax in case of partner's disregard of requirements of this section, see part II of subchapter A of chapter 68.

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If any partnership adjustment with respect to any partnership item takes effect (within the meaning of subsection (d)(2)) during any partnership taxable year and if an election under paragraph (2) does not apply to such adjustment, such adjustment shall be taken into account in determining the amount of such item for the partnership taxable year in which such adjustment takes effect. In applying this title to any person who is (directly or indirectly) a partner in such partnership during such partnership taxable year, such adjustment shall be treated as an item actually arising during such taxable year.

"(2) PARTNERSHIP LIABLE IN CERTAIN CASES.—If—

"(A) a partnership elects under this paragraph to not take an adjustment into account under paragraph (1),

"(B) a partnership does not make such an election but in filing its return for any partnership taxable year fails to take fully into account any partnership adjustment as required under paragraph (1), or

"(C) any partnership adjustment involves a reduction in a credit which exceeds the amount of such credit determined for the partnership taxable year in which the adjustment takes effect, the partnership shall pay to the Secretary an amount determined by applying the rules of subsection (b)(4) to the adjustments not so taken into account and any excess referred to in subparagraph (C).

"(3) OFFSETTING ADJUSTMENTS TAKEN INTO ACCOUNT.—If a partnership adjustment requires another adjustment in a taxable year after the adjusted year and before the partnership taxable year in which such partnership adjustment takes effect, such other adjustment shall be taken into account under this subsection for the partnership taxable year in which such partnership adjustment takes effect.

"(4) COORDINATION WITH PART II.—Amounts taken into account under this subsection for any partnership taxable year shall continue to be treated as adjustments for the adjusted year for purposes of determining whether such amounts may be readjusted under part II.

"(b) PARTNERSHIP LIABLE FOR INTEREST AND PENALTIES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If a partnership adjustment takes effect during any partnership taxable year and such adjustment results in an imputed underpayment for the adjusted year, the partnership—

"(A) shall pay to the Secretary interest computed under paragraph (2), and

"(B) shall be liable for any penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount as provided in paragraph (3).

"(2) DETERMINATION OF AMOUNT OF INTEREST.—The interest computed under this paragraph with respect to any partnership adjustment is the interest which would be determined under chapter 67—

"(A) on the imputed underpayment determined under paragraph (4) with respect to such adjustment, or

"(B) for the period beginning on the day after the return due date for the adjusted year and ending on the return due date for the partnership taxable year in which such adjustment takes effect (or, if earlier, in the case of any adjustment to which subsection (a)(2) applies, the date on which the payment under subsection (a)(2) is made).

Proper adjustments in the amount determined under the preceding sentence shall be made for adjustments required for partnership taxable years after the adjusted year and before the year in which the partnership adjustment takes effect by reason of such partnership adjustment.

"(3) PENALTIES.—A partnership shall be liable for any penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount for which it would have been liable if such partnership had been an individual subject to tax under chapter 1 for the adjusted year and the imputed underpayment determined under paragraph (4) were an actual underpayment (or understatement) for such year.

"(4) IMPUTED UNDERPAYMENT.—For purposes of this subsection, the imputed underpayment determined under this paragraph with respect to any partnership adjustment is the underpayment (if any) which would result—

"(A) by netting all adjustments to items of income, gain, loss, or deduction and—

"(i) if such netting results in a net increase in income, by treating such net increase as an underpayment equal to the amount of such net increase multiplied by the highest rate of tax in effect under section 1 or 11 for the adjusted year, or

"(ii) if such netting results in a net decrease in income, by treating such net decrease as an overpayment equal to such net decrease multiplied by such highest rate, and

"(B) by taking adjustments to credits into account as increases or decreases (whichever is appropriate) in the amount of tax.

For purposes of the preceding sentence, any net decrease in a loss shall be treated as an increase in income and a similar rule shall apply to a net increase in a loss.

"(c) ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Any payment required by subsection (a)(2) or (b)(1)(A)—

"(A) shall be assessed and collected in the same manner as if it were a tax imposed by subtitle C, and

"(B) shall be paid on or before the return due date for the partnership taxable year in which the partnership adjustment takes effect.

"(2) INTEREST.—For purposes of determining interest, any payment required by subsection (a)(2) or (b)(1)(A) shall be treated as an underpayment of tax.

"(3) PENALTIES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In the case of any failure by any partnership to pay on the date prescribed therefor any amount required by subsection (a)(2) or (b)(1)(A), there is hereby imposed on such partnership a penalty of 10 percent of the underpayment. For purposes of the preceding sentence, the term 'underpayment' means the excess of any payment required under this section over the amount (if any) paid on or before the date prescribed therefor.

"(B) ACCURACY-RELATED AND FRAUD PENALTIES MADE APPLICABLE.—For purposes of part II of subchapter A of chapter 68, any payment required by subsection (a)(2) shall be treated as an underpayment of tax.

"(2) WHEN ADJUSTMENT TAKES EFFECT.—A partnership adjustment takes effect—

"(A) in the case of an adjustment pursuant to the decision of a court in a proceeding brought under part II, when such decision becomes final,

"(B) in the case of an adjustment pursuant to any administrative adjustment request under section 6251, when such adjustment is allowed by the Secretary, or

"(C) in any other case, when such adjustment is made.

"(3) ADJUSTED YEAR.—The term 'adjusted year' means the partnership taxable year to which the item being adjusted relates.

"(4) RETURN DUE DATE.—The term 'return due date' means, with respect to any taxable year, the date prescribed for filing the partnership return for such taxable year (determined without regard to extensions).

"(e) PAYMENTS NONDEDUCTIBLE.—No deduction shall be allowed under subtitle A for any payment required to be made by a large partnership under this section.

"(b) NOTICE OF PARTNERSHIP ADJUSTMENT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If the Secretary determines that a partnership adjustment is required, the Secretary is authorized to send notice of such adjustment to the partnership by certified mail or registered mail. Such notice shall be sufficient if mailed to the partnership at its last known address even if the partnership has terminated its existence.

"(2) FURTHER NOTICES RESTRICTED.—If the Secretary mails a notice of a partnership adjustment to any partnership for any partnership taxable year and the partnership files a petition under section 6247 with respect to such notice, in the absence of a showing of fraud, malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact, the Secretary shall not mail another such notice to such partnership with respect to such taxable year.

"(3) AUTHORITY TO RESCIND NOTICE WITH PARTNERSHIP CONSENT.—The Secretary may, with the consent of the partnership, rescind any notice of a partnership adjustment mailed to such partnership. Any notice so rescinded shall not be treated as a notice of a partnership adjustment, for purposes of this section, section 6246, and section 6247, and the taxpayer shall have no right to bring a proceeding under section 6247 with respect to such notice. Nothing in this subsection shall affect any suspension of the running of any period of limitations during any period during which the rescinded notice was outstanding.

"SEC. 6246. RESTRICTIONS ON PARTNERSHIP ADJUSTMENTS.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—Except as otherwise provided in this chapter, no adjustment to any partnership item may be made (and no levy or proceeding in any court for the collection of any amount resulting from such adjustment may be made, begun or prosecuted) before—

"(1) the close of the 90th day after the day on which a notice of a partnership adjustment was mailed to the partnership, and

"(2) if a petition is filed under section 6247 with respect to such notice, the decision of the court has become final.

"(b) PREMATURE ACTION MAY BE ENJOINED.—Notwithstanding section 7421(a), any action which violates subsection (a) may be enjoined in the proper court, including the Tax Court. The Tax Court shall have no jurisdiction to enjoin any action under this subsection unless a timely petition has been filed under section 6247 and then only in respect of the adjustments that are the subject of such petition.

"(c) Exceptions to Restrictions on Adjustments.—

"(1) Adjustments arising out of math or clerical errors.—

"(A) In general.—If the partnership is notified that, on account of a mathematical or clerical error appearing on the partnership return, an adjustment to a partnership item is required, rules similar to the rules of paragraphs (1) and (2) of section 6213(b) shall apply to such adjustment.

"(B) Special rule.—If a large partnership is a partner in another large partnership, any adjustment on account of such partnership's failure to comply with the requirements of section 6241(a) with respect to its interest in such other partnership shall be treated as an adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A), except that paragraph (2) of section 6213(b) shall not apply to such adjustment.

"(2) Partnership may waive restrictions.—The partnership shall at any time (whether or not a notice of partnership adjustment has been issued) have the right, by a signed notice in writing filed with the Secretary, to waive the restrictions provided in subsection (a) on the making of any partnership adjustment.

"(d) Limit Where No Proceeding Begun.—If no proceeding under section 6247 is begun with respect to any notice of a partnership adjustment during the 90-day period described in subsection (a), the amount for which the partnership is liable under section 6242 (and any increase in any partner's liability for tax under chapter 1 by reason of any adjustment under section 6242(a)) shall not exceed the amount determined in accordance with such notice.

"SEC. 6247. JUDICIAL REVIEW OF PARTNERSHIP ADJUSTMENT.

"(3) the Claims Court.

"(b) Jurisdictional Requirement for Bringing Action in District Court or Claims Court.—

"(1) In general.—A readjustment petition under this section may be filed in a district court of the United States or the Claims Court only if the partnership filing the petition deposits with the Secretary, on or before the date the petition is filed, the amount for which the partnership would be liable under section 6242(b) (as of the date of the filing of the petition) if the partnership items were adjusted as provided by the notice of partnership adjustment. The court may by order provide that the jurisdictional requirements of this paragraph are satisfied where there has been a good faith attempt to satisfy such requirement and any shortfall of the amount required to be deposited is timely corrected.

"(2) Interest payable.—Any amount deposited under paragraph (1), while deposited, shall not be treated as a payment of tax for purposes of this title (other than chapter 67).

"(c) Scope of Judicial Review.—A court with which a petition is filed in accordance with this section shall have jurisdiction to determine all partnership items of the partnership for the partnership taxable year to which the notice of partnership adjustment relates and the proper allocation of such items among the partners (and the applicability of any penalty, addition to tax, or additional amount for which the partnership may be liable under section 6242(b)).

"(d) Determination of Court Reviewable.—Any determination by a court under this section shall have the force and effect of a decision of the Tax Court or a final judgment or decree of the district court or the Claims Court, as the case may be, and shall be reviewable as such. The date of any such determination shall be treated as being the date of the court's order entering the decision.

"(e) Effect of Decision Dismissing Action.—If an action brought under this section is dismissed other than by reason of a rescission under section 6245(b)(3), the decision of the court dismissing the action shall be considered as its decision that the notice of partnership adjustment is correct, and an appropriate order shall be entered in the records of the court.

"(a) General Rule.—Except as otherwise provided in this section, no adjustment under this subpart to any partnership item for any partnership taxable year may be made after the date which is 3 years after the later of—

"(1) the date on which the partnership return for such taxable year was filed, or

"(2) the last day for filing such return for such year (determined without regard to extensions).

"(b) Extension by Agreement.—The period described in subsection (a) (including an extension period under this subsection) may be extended by an agreement entered into by the Secretary and the partnership before the expiration of such period.

"(c) Special Rule in Case of Fraud, Etc.—

"(2) Substantial omission of income.—If any partnership omits from gross income an amount properly includible therein which is in excess of 25 percent of the amount of gross income stated in its return, subsection (a) shall be applied by substituting '6 years' for '3 years'.

"(3) No return.—In the case of a failure by a partnership to file a return for any taxable year, the adjustment may be made at any time.

"(4) Return filed by secretary.—For purposes of this section, a return executed by the Secretary under subsection (b) of section 6020 on behalf of the partnership shall not be treated as a return of the partnership.

"(d) Suspension When Secretary Mails Notice of Adjustment.—If notice of a partnership adjustment with respect to any taxable year is mailed to the partnership, the running of the period specified in subsection (a) (as modified by the other provisions of this section) shall be suspended—

"(1) for the period during which an action may be brought under section 6247 (and, if a petition is filed under section 6247 with respect to such notice, until the decision of the court becomes final), and

"(2) for 1 year thereafter.

"SEC. 6251. ADMINISTRATIVE ADJUSTMENT REQUESTS.

"(a) General Rule.—A partnership may file a request for an administrative adjustment of partnership items for any partnership taxable year at any time which is—

"(1) within 3 years after the later of—

"(A) the date on which the partnership return for such year is filed, or

"(B) the last day for filing the partnership return for such year (determined without regard to extensions), and

"(2) before the mailing to the partnership of a notice of a partnership adjustment with respect to such taxable year.

"(b) Secretarial Action.—If a partnership files an administrative adjustment request under subsection (a), the Secretary may allow any part of the requested adjustments.

"(c) Special Rule in Case of Extension Under Section 6248.—If the period described in section 6248(a) is extended pursuant to an agreement under section 6248(b), the period prescribed by subsection (a)(1) shall not expire before the date 6 months after the expiration of the extension under section 6248(b).

"(a) In General.—If any part of an administrative adjustment request filed under section 6251 is not allowed by the Secretary, the partnership may file a petition for an adjustment with respect to the partnership items to which such part of the request relates with—

The 2-year period set forth in paragraph (2) shall be extended for such period as may be agreed upon in writing by the partnership and the Secretary.

"(c) Coordination With Subpart A.—

"(1) Notice of partnership adjustment before filing of petition.—No petition may be filed under this section after the Secretary mails to the partnership a notice of a partnership adjustment for the partnership taxable year to which the request under section 6251 relates.

"(2) Notice of partnership adjustment after filing but before hearing of petition.—If the Secretary mails to the partnership a notice of a partnership adjustment for the partnership taxable year to which the request under section 6251 relates after the filing of a petition under this subsection but before the hearing of such petition, such petition shall be treated as an action brought under section 6247 with respect to such notice, except that subsection (b) of section 6247 shall not apply.

"(3) Notice must be before expiration of statute of limitations.—A notice of a partnership adjustment for the partnership taxable year shall be taken into account under paragraphs (1) and (2) only if such notice is mailed before the expiration of the period prescribed by section 6248 for making adjustments to partnership items for such taxable year.

"(d) Scope of Judicial Review.—Except in the case described in paragraph (2) of subsection (c), a court with which a petition is filed in accordance with this section shall have jurisdiction to determine only those partnership items to which the part of the request under section 6251 not allowed by the Secretary relates and those items with respect to which the Secretary asserts adjustments as offsets to the adjustments requested by the partnership.

"(e) Determination of Court Reviewable.—Any determination by a court under this subsection shall have the force and effect of a decision of the Tax Court or a final judgment or decree of the district court or the Claims Court, as the case may be, and shall be reviewable as such. The date of any such determination shall be treated as being the date of the court's order entering the decision.

PART II—PROVISIONS RELATED TO TEFRA PARTNERSHIP PROCEEDINGS

"SEC. 6234. DECLARATORY JUDGMENT RELATING TO TREATMENT OF ITEMS OTHER THAN PARTNERSHIP ITEMS WITH RESPECT TO AN OVERSHELTERED RETURN.

"(a) General Rule.—If—

"(2) the Secretary makes a determination with respect to the treatment of items (other than partnership items) of such taxpayer for such taxable year, and

"(3) the adjustments resulting from such determination do not give rise to a deficiency (as defined in section 6211) but would give rise to a deficiency if there were no net loss from partnership items, the Secretary is authorized to send a notice of adjustment reflecting such determination to the taxpayer by certified or registered mail.

"(b) Oversheltered Return.—For purposes of this section, the term 'oversheltered return' means an income tax return which—

"(1) shows no taxable income for the taxable year, and

"(c) Judicial Review in the Tax Court.—Within 90 days, or 150 days if the notice is addressed to a person outside the United States, after the day on which the notice of adjustment authorized in subsection (a) is mailed to the taxpayer, the taxpayer may file a petition with the Tax Court for redetermination of the adjustments. Upon the filing of such a petition, the Tax Court shall have jurisdiction to make a declaration with respect to all items (other than partnership items and affected items which require partner level determinations as described in section 6230(a)(2)(A)(i)) for the taxable year to which the notice of adjustment relates, in accordance with the principles of section 6214(a). Any such declaration shall have the force and effect of a decision of the Tax Court and shall be reviewable as such.

"(d) Failure To File Petition.—

"(1) In general.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), if the taxpayer does not file a petition with the Tax Court within the time prescribed in subsection (c), the determination of the Secretary set forth in the notice of adjustment that was mailed to the taxpayer shall be deemed to be correct.

"(2) Exception.—Paragraph (1) shall not apply after the date that the taxpayer—

"(A) files a petition with the Tax Court within the time prescribed in subsection (c) with respect to a subsequent notice of adjustment relating to the same taxable year, or

"(B) files a claim for refund of an overpayment of tax under section 6511 for the taxable year involved.

If a claim for refund is filed by the taxpayer, then solely for purposes of determining (for the taxable year involved) the amount of any computational adjustment in connection with a partnership proceeding under this subchapter (other than under this section) or the amount of any deficiency attributable to affected items in a proceeding under section 6230(a)(2), the items that are the subject of the notice of adjustment shall be presumed to have been correctly reported on the taxpayer's return during the pendency of the refund claim (and, if within the time prescribed by section 6532 the taxpayer commences a civil action for refund under section 7422, until the decision in the refund action becomes final).

"(e) Limitations Period.—

"(1) In general.—Any notice to a taxpayer under subsection (a) shall be mailed before the expiration of the period prescribed by section 6501 (relating to the period of limitations on assessment).

"(2) Suspension when Secretary mails notice of adjustment.—If the Secretary mails a notice of adjustment to the taxpayer for a taxable year, the period of limitations on the making of assessments shall be suspended for the period during which the Secretary is prohibited from making the assessment (and, in any event, if a proceeding in respect of the notice of adjustment is placed on the docket of the Tax Court, until the decision of the Tax Court becomes final), and for 60 days thereafter.

"(3) RESTRICTIONS ON ASSESSMENT.—Except as otherwise provided in section 6851, 6852, or 6861, no assessment of a deficiency with respect to any tax imposed by subtitle A attributable to any item (other than a partnership item or any item affected by a partnership item) shall be made—

"(A) until the expiration of the applicable 90-day or 150-day period set forth in subsection (c) for filing a petition with the Tax Court, or

"(B) if a petition has been filed with the Tax Court, until the decision of the Tax Court has become final.

"(f) FURTHER NOTICES OF ADJUSTMENT RESTRICTED.—If the Secretary mails a notice of adjustment to the taxpayer for a taxable year and the taxpayer files a petition with the Tax Court within the time prescribed in subsection (c), the Secretary may not mail another such notice to the taxpayer with respect to the same taxable year in the absence of a showing of fraud, malfeasance, or misrepresentation of a material fact.

"(g) COORDINATION WITH OTHER PROCEEDINGS UNDER THIS SUBCHAPTER.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The treatment of any item that has been determined pursuant to subsection (c) or (d) shall be taken into account in determining the amount of any computational adjustment that is made in connection with a partnership proceeding under this subchapter (other than under this section), or the amount of any deficiency attributable to affected items in a proceeding under section 6230(a)(2), for the taxable year involved. Notwithstanding any other law or rule of law pertaining to the period of limitations on the making of assessments, for purposes of the preceding sentence, any adjustment made in accordance with this section shall be taken into account regardless of whether any assessment has been made with respect to such adjustment.

"(2) SPECIAL RULE IN CASE OF COMPUTATIONAL ADJUSTMENT.—In the case of a computational adjustment that is made in connection with a partnership proceeding under this subchapter (other than under this section), the provisions of paragraph (1) shall apply only if the computational adjustment is made within the period prescribed by section 6229 for assessing any tax under subtitle A which is attributable to any partnership item or affected item for the taxable year involved.

"(3) CONVERSION TO DEFICIENCY PROCEEDING.—If—

"(A) after the notice referred to in subsection (a) is mailed to a taxpayer for a taxable year but before the expiration of the period for filing a petition with the Tax Court under subsection (c) (or, if a petition is filed with the Tax Court, before the Tax Court makes a declaration for that taxable year), the treatment of any partnership item for the taxable year is finally determined, or any such item ceases to be a partnership item pursuant to section 6231(b), and

"(B) as a result of that final determination or cessation, a deficiency can be determined with respect to the items that are the subject of the notice of adjustment, the notice of adjustment shall be treated as a notice of deficiency under section 6212 and any petition filed in respect of the notice shall be treated as an action brought under section 6213.

"(4) FINALLY DETERMINED.—For purposes of this subsection, the treatment of partnership items shall be treated as finally determined if—

"(A) the Secretary enters into a settlement agreement (within the meaning of section 6224) with the taxpayer regarding such items,

"(B) a notice of final partnership administrative adjustment has been issued and—

"(i) no petition has been filed under section 6226 and the time for doing so has expired, or

"(ii) a petition has been filed under section 6226 and the decision of the court has become final, or

"(C) the period within which any tax attributable to such items may be assessed against the taxpayer has expired.

"(h) SPECIAL RULES IF SECRETARY INCORRECTLY DETERMINES APPLICABLE PROCEDURE.—

"(1) SPECIAL RULE IF SECRETARY ERRONEOUSLY MAILS NOTICE OF ADJUSTMENT.—If the Secretary erroneously determines that subchapter B does not apply to a taxable year of a taxpayer and consistent with that determination timely mails a notice of adjustment to the taxpayer pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the notice of adjustment shall be treated as a notice of deficiency under section 6212 and any petition that is filed in respect of the notice shall be treated as an action brought under section 6213.

"(2) SPECIAL RULE IF SECRETARY ERRONEOUSLY MAILS NOTICE OF DEFICIENCY.—If the Secretary erroneously determines that subchapter B applies to a taxable year of a taxpayer and consistent with that determination timely mails a notice of deficiency to the taxpayer pursuant to section 6212, the notice of deficiency shall be treated as a notice of adjustment under subsection (a) and any petition that is filed in respect of the notice shall be treated as an action brought under subsection (c)."

"(2) DETERMINATION THAT SUBCHAPTER DOES NOT APPLY.—If, on the basis of a partnership return for a taxable year, the Secretary reasonably determines that this subchapter does not apply to such partnership for such year but such determination is erroneous, then the provisions of this subchapter shall not apply to such partnership (and its items) for such taxable year or to partners of such partnership."

"(i) amount allowed as a deduction under subsection (a)(2), and

"(ii) loss on the sale or other disposition of marketable stock in a passive foreign corporation to the extent that the amount of such loss does not exceed the unreversed inclusions with respect to such stock, shall be treated as an ordinary loss. The amount so treated shall be treated as a deduction allowable in computing adjusted gross income.

"(2) Source.—The source of any amount included in gross income under subsection (a)(1) (or allowed as a deduction under subsection (a)(2)) shall be determined in the same manner as if such amount were gain or loss (as the case may be) from the sale of stock in the passive foreign corporation.

"(d) Unreversed Inclusions.—For purposes of this section, the term 'unreversed inclusions' means, with respect to any stock in a passive foreign corporation, the excess (if any) of—

"(1) the amount included in gross income of the taxpayer under subsection (a)(1) with respect to such stock for prior taxable years, over

"(2) the amount allowed as a deduction under subsection (a)(2) with respect to such stock for prior taxable years.

The amount referred to in paragraph (1) shall include any amount which would have been included in gross income under subsection (a)(1) with respect to such stock for any prior taxable year but for section 1293.

"(e) Coordination With Section 1292.—This section shall not apply with respect to any stock in a passive foreign corporation—

"(1) which is U.S. controlled,

"(2) which is a qualified electing fund with respect to the United States person for the taxable year, or

"(3) in which the United States person is a 25-percent shareholder.

"(f) Treatment of Controlled Foreign Corporations Which are Shareholders in Passive Foreign Corporations.—In the case of a foreign corporation which is a controlled foreign corporation (or is treated as a controlled foreign corporation under section 1292) and which owns (or is treated under subsection (g) as owning) stock in a passive foreign corporation—

"(1) this section (other than subsection (c)(2) thereof) shall apply to such foreign corporation in the same manner as if such corporation were a United States person, and

"(2) for purposes of subpart F of part III of subchapter N—

"(A) any amount included in gross income under subsection (a)(1) shall be treated as foreign personal holding company income described in section 954(c)(1)(A), and

"(B) any amount allowed as a deduction under subsection (a)(2) shall be treated as a deduction allocable to foreign personal holding company income so described.

"(g) Stock Owned Through Certain Foreign Entities.—Except as provided in regulations—

"(1) In general.—For purposes of this section, stock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for a foreign partnership or foreign trust or foreign estate shall be considered as being owned proportionately by its partners or beneficiaries. Stock considered to be owned by a person by reason of the application of the preceding sentence shall, for purposes of applying such sentence, be treated as actually owned by such person.

"(2) Treatment of certain dispositions.—In any case in which a United States person is treated as owning stock in a passive foreign corporation by reason of paragraph (1)—

"(A) any disposition by the United States person or by any other person which results in the United States person being treated as no longer owning such stock, and shall be treated as a disposition by the United States person of the stock in the passive foreign corporation.

"(B) any disposition by the person owning such stock,

"(h) Coordination With Section 851(b).—For purposes of paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 851(b), any amount included in gross income under subsection (a) shall be treated as a dividend.

"(i) Transition Rules.—

"(1) Individuals becoming subject to U.S. tax.—If any individual becomes a United States person in a taxable year beginning after December 31, 1992, solely for purposes of this section, the adjusted basis (before adjustments under subsection (b)) of any marketable stock in a passive foreign corporation owned (or treated as owned under subsection (g)) by such individual on the first day of such taxable year shall be treated as being the greater of its fair market value on such first day or its adjusted basis on such first day.

"(2) Marketable stock held before effective date.—

"(A) In general.—If any marketable stock in a passive foreign corporation is owned (or treated under subsection (g) as owned) by a United States person on the first day of such person's first taxable year, beginning after December 31, 1992—

"(i) paragraph (2) of section 1294(a) shall apply to such stock as if it became marketable during such first taxable year; except that—

"(I) section 1293 shall not apply to the amount included in gross income under subsection (a) to the extent such amount is attributable to increases in fair market value during such first taxable year, and

"(II) the taxpayer's holding period shall be treated as having ended on the last day of the preceding taxable year for purposes of allocating amounts under section 1293(a)(1)(A), and

"(ii) such person may elect to extend the time for the payment of the applicable section 1293 deferred tax as provided in subparagraph (B).

"(B) Election to extend time for payment.—

"(i) In general.—At the election of the taxpayer, the time for the payment of the applicable section 1293 deferred tax shall be extended to the extent and subject to the limitations provided in this subparagraph.

"(ii) Termination of extension.—

"(I) Distributions.—If any distribution is received with respect to any stock to which an extension under clause (i) relates and such distribution would be an excess distribution within the meaning of section 1293 if such section applied to such stock, then the extension under clause (i) for the appropriate portion (as determined under regulations) of the applicable section 1293 deferred tax shall expire on the last day prescribed by law (determined without regard to extensions) for filing the return of tax for the taxable year in which the distribution is received.

"(II) Reversal of inclusion.—If an amount is allowable as a deduction under subsection (a)(2) with respect to any stock to which an extension under clause (i) relates and the amount so allowable is allocable to the amount which gave rise to the applicable section 1293 deferred tax, then the extension under clause (i) for the appropriate portion (as determined under regulations) of the applicable section 1293 deferred tax shall expire on the last day prescribed by law (determined without regard to extensions) for filing the return of the tax for the taxable year for which such deduction is allowed.

"(III) Dispositions, etc.—If stock in a passive foreign corporation is disposed of during the taxable year, all extensions under clause (i) for payment of the applicable section 1293 deferred tax attributable to such stock which have not expired before the date of such disposition shall expire on the last date prescribed by law (determined without regard to extensions) for filing the return of tax for the taxable year in which such disposition occurs. To the extent provided in regulations, the preceding sentence shall not apply in the case of a disposition in a transaction with respect to which gain or loss is not recognized (in whole or in part), and the person acquiring such stock in such transaction shall succeed to the treatment under this section of the person making such disposition.

"(iii) Other rules.—

"(I) Election.—The election under clause (i) shall be made not later than the time prescribed by law (including extensions) for filing the return of tax imposed by this chapter for the first taxable year referred to in subparagraph (A).

"(II) Treatment of loans to shareholder.—For purposes of this subparagraph, any loan by a passive foreign corporation (directly or indirectly) to a shareholder of such corporation shall be treated as a distribution to such shareholder.

"(C) Cross reference.—

"For provisions providing for interest for the period of the extension under this paragraph, see section 6601.

"(D) Applicable section 1293 deferred tax.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'applicable section 1293 deferred tax' means the deferred tax amount determined under section 1293 with respect to the amount which, but for section 1293, would have been included in gross income for the first taxable year referred to in subparagraph (A). Such term also includes the tax imposed by this chapter for such first taxable year to the extent attributable to the amounts allocated under section 1293(a)(1)(A) to a period described in section 1293(a)(1)(B)(ii).

"(3) SPECIAL RULES FOR REGULATED INVESTMENT COMPANIES.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If any marketable stock in a passive foreign corporation is owned (or treated under subsection (g) as owned) by a regulated investment company on the first day of such company's first taxable year beginning after December 31, 1992—

"(i) section 1293 shall not apply to such stock with respect to any distribution or disposition during, or amount included in gross income under this section for, such first taxable year, but

"(ii) such company's tax under this chapter for such first taxable year shall be increased by the aggregate amount of interest which would have been determined under section 1293(c)(3) if section 1293 were applied without regard to this subparagraph.

"(B) DISALLOWANCE OF DEDUCTION.—No deduction shall be allowed to any regulated investment company for the increase in tax under subparagraph (A)(ii).

"(1) TREATMENT UNDER SUBPART F.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If a passive foreign corporation is United States controlled, then for purposes of subpart F of part III of subchapter N—

"(i) such corporation, if not otherwise a controlled foreign corporation, shall be treated as a controlled foreign corporation,

"(ii) the term 'United States shareholder' means, with respect to such corporation, any United States person who owns (within the meaning of section 958(a)) any stock in such corporation,

"(iii) the entire gross income of such corporation shall, after being reduced under the principles of paragraph (5) of section 954(b), be treated as foreign base company income, and

"(iv) sections 970 and 971 shall not apply.

Except as provided in regulations, the preceding sentence shall also apply for purposes of section 904(d).

"(B) SPECIAL RULES.—If any taxpayer is treated as being a United States shareholder in a controlled foreign corporation solely by reason of this section—

"(i) section 954(b)(4) (relating to exception for certain income subject to high foreign taxes) shall not apply for purposes of determining the amount included in the gross income of such taxpayer under section 951 by reason of being so treated with respect to such corporation, and

"(ii) the amount so included in the gross income of such taxpayer under section 951 with respect to such corporation shall be treated as long-term capital gain to the extent attributable to the net capital gain of such corporation.

"(2) U.S. CONTROLLED.—For purposes of this subpart, a passive foreign corporation is United States controlled if—

"(A) such corporation is a controlled foreign corporation determined without regard to this subsection, or

"(B) at any time during the taxable year more than 50 percent of—

"(i) the total combined voting power of all classes of stock of such corporation entitled to vote, or

"(ii) the total value of the stock of such corporation, is owned directly or indirectly by 5 or fewer United States persons.

"(3) CONSTRUCTIVE OWNERSHIP RULES FOR PURPOSES OF PARAGRAPH (2)(B).—For purposes of paragraph (2)(B), the attribution rules provided in section 544 shall apply, determined as if any reference to a personal holding company were a reference to a corporation described in paragraph (2)(B) (and any reference to the stock ownership requirement provided in section 542(a)(2) were a reference to the requirement of paragraph (2)(B)); except that—

"(A) subsection (a)(4) of such section shall be applied by substituting 'Paragraphs (1), (2), and (3)' for 'Paragraphs (2) and (3)',

"(B) stock owned by a nonresident alien individual shall not be considered by reason of attribution through family membership as owned by a citizen or resident alien individual who is not the spouse of the nonresident alien individual and who does not otherwise own stock in the foreign corporation (determined after the application of such attribution rules other than attribution through family membership), and

"(C) stock of a corporation owned by any foreign person shall not be considered by reason of attribution through partners as owned by a citizen or resident of the United States who does not otherwise own stock in the foreign corporation (determined after the application of such attribution rules and subparagraph (A), other than attribution through partners).

"(b) TAXPAYERS ELECTING CURRENT INCLUSION AND 25-PERCENT SHAREHOLDERS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If a passive foreign corporation which is not United States controlled is a qualified electing fund with respect to any taxpayer or the taxpayer is a 25-percent shareholder in such corporation, then for purposes of subpart F of part III of subchapter N—

"(A) such passive foreign corporation shall be treated as a controlled foreign corporation with respect to such taxpayer,

"(B) such taxpayer shall be treated as a United States shareholder in such corporation, and

"(C) the modifications of clauses (iii) and (iv) of subsection (a)(1)(A) and of subparagraph (B) of subsection (a)(1) shall apply in determining the amount included under such subpart F in the gross income of such taxpayer (and the character of the amount so included).

For purposes of section 904(d), any amount included in the gross income of the taxpayer under the preceding sentence shall be treated as a dividend from a foreign corporation which is not a controlled foreign corporation.

"(2) QUALIFIED ELECTING FUND.—For purposes of this subpart, the term 'qualified electing fund' means any passive foreign corporation if—

"(A) an election by the taxpayer under paragraph (3) applies to such corporation for the taxable year of the taxpayer, and

"(B) such corporation complies with such requirements as the Secretary may prescribe for purposes of carrying out the purposes of this subpart.

"(3) ELECTION.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—A taxpayer may make an election under this paragraph with respect to any passive foreign corporation for any taxable year of the taxpayer. Such an election, once made with respect to any corporation, shall apply to all subsequent taxable years of the taxpayer with respect to such corporation unless revoked by the taxpayer with the consent of the Secretary.

"(B) WHEN MADE.—An election under this subsection may be made for any taxable year of the taxpayer at any time on or before the due date (determined with regard to extensions) for filing the return of the tax imposed by this chapter for such taxable year. To the extent provided in regulations, such an election may be made later than as required in the preceding sentence where the taxpayer fails to make a timely election because the taxpayer reasonably believes that the corporation was not a passive foreign corporation.

"(4) 25-PERCENT SHAREHOLDER.—For purposes of this subpart, the term '25-percent shareholder' means, with respect to any passive foreign corporation, any United States person who owns (within the meaning of section 958(a)), or is considered as owning by applying the rules of section 958(b), 25 percent or more (by vote or value) of the stock of such corporation.

"SUBPART B—INTEREST ON HOLDINGS TO WHICH SUBPART A DOES NOT APPLY

"Sec. 1294. Definitions and special rules.

"(a) TREATMENT OF DISTRIBUTIONS AND STOCK DISPOSITIONS.—

"(1) DISTRIBUTIONS.—If a United States person receives an excess distribution in respect of stock to which this section applies, then—

"(A) the amount of the excess distribution shall be allocated ratably to each day in the taxpayer's holding period for the stock,

"(B) with respect to such excess distribution, the taxpayer's gross income for the current year shall include (as ordinary income) only the amounts allocated under subparagraph (A) to—

"(i) the current year, or

"(ii) any period in the taxpayer's holding period before the first day of the first taxable year of the corporation which begins after December 31, 1986, and for which it was a passive foreign corporation, and

"(C) the tax imposed by this chapter for the current year shall be increased by the deferred tax amount (determined under subsection (c)).

"(2) DISPOSITIONS.—If the taxpayer disposes of stock to which this section applies, then the rules of paragraph (1) shall apply to any gain recognized on such disposition in the same manner as if such gain were an excess distribution.

"(3) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subpart—

"(A) HOLDING PERIOD.—The taxpayer's holding period shall be determined under section 1223; except that—

"(i) for purposes of applying this section to an excess distribution, such holding period shall be treated as ending on the date of such distribution, and

"(ii) if section 1291 applied to such stock with respect to the taxpayer for any prior taxable year, such holding period shall be treated as beginning on the first day of the first taxable year beginning after the last taxable year for which section 1291 so applied.

"(B) CURRENT YEAR.—The term 'current year' means the taxable year in which the excess distribution or disposition occurs.

"(b) EXCESS DISTRIBUTION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this section, the term 'excess distribution' means any distribution in respect of stock received during any taxable year to the extent such distribution does not exceed its ratable portion of the total excess distribution (if any) for such taxable year.

"(2) TOTAL EXCESS DISTRIBUTION.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'total excess distribution' means the excess (if any) of—

"(i) the amount of the distributions in respect of the stock received by the taxpayer during the taxable year, over

"(ii) 125 percent of the average amount received in respect of such stock by the taxpayer during the 3 preceding taxable years (or, if shorter, the portion of the taxpayer's holding period before the taxable year).

For purposes of clause (ii), any excess distribution received during such 3-year period shall be taken into account only to the extent it was included in gross income under subsection (a)(1)(B).

"(B) NO EXCESS FOR FIRST YEAR.—The total excess distributions with respect to any stock shall be zero for the taxable year in which the taxpayer's holding period in such stock begins.

"(3) ADJUSTMENTS.—Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary—

"(A) determinations under this subsection shall be made on a share-by-share basis, except that shares with the same holding period may be aggregated,

"(B) proper adjustments shall be made for stock splits and stock dividends,

"(C) if the taxpayer does not hold the stock during the entire taxable year, distributions received during such year shall be annualized,

"(D) if the taxpayer's holding period includes periods during which the stock was held by another person, distributions received by such other person shall be taken into account as if received by the taxpayer,

"(E) if the distributions are received in a foreign currency, determinations under this subsection shall be made in such currency and the amount of any excess distribution determined in such currency shall be translated into dollars,

"(F) proper adjustment shall be made for amounts not includible in gross income by reason of section 959(a) or for which a deduction is allowable under section 245(c), and

"(G) if a charitable deduction was allowable under section 642(c) to a trust for any distribution of its income, proper adjustments shall be made for the deduction so allowable to the extent allocable to distributions or gain in respect of stock in a passive foreign corporation.

For purposes of subparagraph (F), any amount not includible in gross income by reason of section 551(d) (as in effect on January 1, 1992) or 1293(c) (as so in effect) shall be treated as an amount not includible in gross income by reason of section 959(a).

"(c) DEFERRED TAX AMOUNT.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—The term 'deferred tax amount' means, with respect to any distribution or disposition to which subsection (a) applies, an amount equal to the sum of—

"(A) the aggregate increases in taxes described in paragraph (2), plus

"(B) the aggregate amount of interest (determined in the manner provided under paragraph (3)) on such increases in tax.

Any increase in the tax imposed by this chapter for the current year under subsection (a) to the extent attributable to the amount referred to in subparagraph (B) shall be treated as interest paid under section 6601 on the due date for the current year.

"(2) AGGREGATE INCREASES IN TAXES.—For purposes of paragraph (1)(A), the aggregate increases in taxes shall be determined by multiplying each amount allocated under subsection (a)(1)(A) to any taxable year (other than the current year) by the highest rate of tax in effect for such taxable year under section 1 or 11, whichever applies.

"(3) COMPUTATION OF INTEREST.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The amount of interest referred to in paragraph (1)(B) on any increase determined under paragraph (2) for any taxable year shall be determined for the period—

"(i) beginning on the due date for such taxable year, and

"(ii) ending on the due date for the taxable year with or within which the distribution or disposition occurs, by using the rates and method applicable under section 6621 for underpayments of tax for such period.

"(B) DUE DATE.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'due date' means the date prescribed by law (determined without regard to extensions) for filing the return of the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year.

"(C) SPECIAL RULE.—For purposes of determining the amount of interest referred to in paragraph (1)(B), the amount of any increase in tax determined under paragraph (2) shall be determined without regard to any reduction under section 1294(d) for a tax described in paragraph (2)(A)(ii) thereof.

"(a) STOCK TO WHICH SECTION 1293 APPLIES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as otherwise provided in this paragraph, section 1293 shall apply to any stock in a passive foreign corporation unless—

"(A) such stock is marketable stock as of the time of the distribution or disposition involved, or

"(B)(i) with respect to each of such corporation's taxable years which begin after December 31, 1992, and include any portion of the taxpayer's holding period in such stock—

"(I) such corporation was U.S. controlled (within the meaning of section 1292(a)(2)), or

"(II) such corporation was treated as a controlled foreign corporation under section 1292(b) with respect to the taxpayer, and

"(ii) with respect to each of such corporation's taxable years which begin after December 31, 1986, and before January 1, 1993, and include any portion of the taxpayer's holding period in such stock, such corporation was treated as a qualified electing fund under this part (as in effect on January 1, 1992) with respect to the taxpayer.

"(2) TREATMENT WHERE STOCK BECOMES MARKETABLE.—If any stock in a passive foreign corporation becomes marketable stock after the beginning of the taxpayer's holding period in such stock, section 1293 shall apply to—

"(A) any distributions with respect to, or disposition of, such stock in the taxable year of the taxpayer in which it becomes so marketable, and

"(B) any amount which, but for section 1293, would have been included in gross income under section 1291(a) with respect to such stock for such taxable year in the same manner as if such amount were gain on the disposition of such stock.

"(3) ELECTION TO RECOGNIZE GAIN WHERE COMPANY BECOMES SUBJECT TO CURRENT INCLUSIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If—

"(i) a passive foreign corporation first meets the requirements of clause (i) of paragraph (1)(B) with respect to the taxpayer for a taxable year of such taxpayer which begins after December 31, 1992,

"(ii) the taxpayer holds stock in such company on the first day of such taxable year, and

"(iii) the taxpayer establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary the fair market value of such stock on such first day, the taxpayer may elect to recognize gain as if he sold such stock on such first day for such fair market value.

"(B) ADDITIONAL ELECTION FOR SHAREHOLDER OF CONTROLLED FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—If—

"(I) a passive foreign corporation first meets the requirements of subclause (I) of paragraph (1)(B)(i) with respect to the taxpayer for a taxable year of such taxpayer which begins after December 31, 1992,

"(II) the taxpayer holds stock in such corporation on the first day of such taxable year, and

"(III) such corporation is a controlled foreign corporation without regard to this part, the taxpayer may elect to be treated as receiving a dividend on such first day in an amount equal to the portion of the post-1986 earnings and profits of such corporation attributable (under regulations prescribed by the Secretary) to the stock in such corporation held by the taxpayer on such first day. The amount treated as a dividend under the preceding sentence shall be treated as an excess distribution and shall be allocated under section 1293(a)(1)(A) only two days during periods taken into account in determining the post-1986 earnings and profits so attributable.

"(ii) POST-1986 EARNINGS AND PROFITS.—For purposes of clause (i), the term 'post-1986 earnings and profits' means earnings and profits which were accumulated in taxable years of the corporation beginning after December 31, 1986, and during the period or periods the stock was held by the taxpayer while the corporation was a passive foreign corporation.

"(iii) COORDINATION WITH SECTION 959(E).—For purposes of section 959(e), any amount treated as a dividend under this subparagraph shall be treated as included in gross income under section 1248(a).

"(C) ADJUSTMENTS.—In the case of any stock to which subparagraph (A) or (B) applies—

"(i) the adjusted basis of such stock shall be increased by the gain recognized under subparagraph (A) or the amount treated as a dividend under subparagraph (B), as the case may be, and

"(ii) the taxpayer's holding period in such stock shall be treated as beginning on the first day referred to in such subparagraph.

"(b) RULES RELATING TO STOCK ACQUIRED FROM A DECEDENT.—

"(1) BASIS.—In the case of stock of a passive foreign corporation acquired by bequest, devise, or inheritance (or by the decedent's estate), notwithstanding section 1014, the basis of such stock in the hands of the person so acquiring it shall be the adjusted basis of such stock in the hands of the decedent immediately before his death (or, if lesser, the basis which would have been determined under section 1014 without regard to this paragraph).

"(2) DEDUCTION FOR ESTATE TAX.—If stock in a passive foreign corporation is acquired from a decedent, the taxpayer shall, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, be allowed (for the taxable year of the sale or exchange) a deduction from gross income equal to that portion of the decedent's estate tax deemed paid which is attributable to the excess of (A) the value at which such stock was taken into account for purposes of determining the value of the decedent's gross estate, over (B) the basis determined under paragraph (1).

"(3) EXCEPTIONS.—This subsection shall not apply to any stock in a passive foreign corporation if—

"(A) section 1293 would not have applied to a disposition of such stock by the decedent immediately before his death, or

"(B) the decedent was a nonresident alien at all times during his holding period in such stock.

"(c) RECOGNITION OF GAIN.—Except as otherwise provided in regulations, in the case of any transfer of stock in a passive foreign company to which section 1293 applies, where (but for this subsection) there is not full recognition of gain, the excess (if any) of—

"(1) the fair market value of such stock, or shall be treated as gain from the sale or exchange of such stock and shall be recognized notwithstanding any provision of law. Proper adjustment shall be made to the basis of property for gain recognized under the preceding sentence.

"(2) its adjusted basis,

"(d) COORDINATION WITH FOREIGN TAX CREDIT RULES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If there are creditable foreign taxes with respect to any distribution in respect of stock in a passive foreign corporation—

"(A) the amount of such distribution shall be determined for purposes of section 1293 with regard to section 78,

"(B) the excess distribution taxes shall be allocated ratably to each day in the taxpayer's holding period for the stock, and

"(C) to the extent—

"(i) that such excess distribution taxes are allocated to a taxable year referred to in section 1293(a)(1)(B), such taxes shall be taken into account under section 901 for the current year, and

"(ii) that such excess distribution taxes are allocated to any other taxable year, such taxes shall reduce (subject to the principles of section 904 and not below zero) the increase in tax determined under section 1293(c)(2) for such taxable year by reason of such distribution (but such taxes shall not be taken into account under section 901).

"(2) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this subsection—

"(A) CREDITABLE FOREIGN TAXES.—The term 'creditable foreign taxes' means, with respect to any distribution—

"(i) any foreign taxes deemed paid under section 902 with respect to such distribution, and

"(ii) any withholding tax imposed with respect to such distribution, but only if the taxpayer chooses the benefits of section 901 and such taxes are creditable under section 901 (determined without regard to paragraph (1)(C)(ii)).

"(B) EXCESS DISTRIBUTION TAXES.—The term 'excess distribution taxes' means, with respect to any distribution, the portion of the creditable foreign taxes with respect to such distribution which is attributable (on a pro rata basis) to the portion of such distribution which is an excess distribution.

"(C) SECTION 1248 GAIN.—The rules of this subsection also shall apply in the case of any gain which but for this section would be includible in gross income as a dividend under section 1248.

"(e) ATTRIBUTION OF OWNERSHIP.—For purposes of this subpart—

"(1) ATTRIBUTION TO UNITED STATES PERSONS.—This subsection—

"(A) shall apply to the extent that the effect is to treat stock of a passive foreign corporation as owned by a United States person, and

"(B) except as provided in paragraph (3) or in regulations, shall not apply to treat stock owned (or treated as owned under this subsection) by a United States person as owned by any other person.

"(2) CORPORATIONS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If 50 percent or more in value of the stock of a corporation (other than an S corporation) is owned, directly or indirectly, by or for any person, such person shall be considered as owning the stock owned directly or indirectly by or for such corporation in that proportion which the value of the stock which such person so owns bears to the value of all stock in the corporation.

"(B) 50-PERCENT LIMITATION NOT TO APPLY IN CERTAIN CASES.—For purposes of determining whether a shareholder of a passive foreign corporation (or whether a United States shareholder of a controlled foreign corporation which is not a passive foreign corporation) is treated as owning stock owned directly or indirectly by or for such corporation, subparagraph (A) shall be applied without regard to the 50-percent limitation contained therein.

"(C) FAMILY AND PARTNER ATTRIBUTION FOR 50-PERCENT LIMITATION.—For purposes of determining whether the 50-percent limitation of subparagraph (A) is met, the constructive ownership rules of section 544(a)(2) shall apply in addition to the other rules of this subsection.

"(3) PARTNERSHIPS, ETC.—Except as provided in regulations, stock owned, directly or indirectly, by or for a partnership, S corporation, estate, or trust shall be considered as being owned proportionately by its partners, shareholders, or beneficiaries (as the case may be).

"(4) OPTIONS.—To the extent provided in regulations, if any person has an option to acquire stock, such stock shall be considered as owned by such person. For purposes of this paragraph, an option to acquire such an option, and each one of a series of such options, shall be considered as an option to acquire such stock.

"(5) SUCCESSIVE APPLICATION.—Stock considered to be owned by a person by reason of the application of paragraph (2), (3), or (4) shall, for purposes of applying such paragraphs, be considered as actually owned by such person.

"(f) OTHER SPECIAL RULES.—For purposes of this subpart—

"(1) TIME FOR DETERMINATION.—Stock held by a taxpayer shall be treated as stock in a passive foreign corporation if, at any time during the holding period of the taxpayer with respect to such stock, such corporation (or any predecessor) was a passive foreign corporation. The preceding sentence shall not apply if the taxpayer elects to recognize gain (as of the last day of the last taxable year for which the company was a passive foreign corporation) under rules similar to the rules of subsection (a)(3)(A).

"(2) APPLICATION OF SUBPART WHERE STOCK HELD BY OTHER ENTITY.—Under regulations—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—In any case in which a United States person is treated as owning stock in a passive foreign corporation by reason of subsection (e)—

"(i) any transaction which results in the United States person being treated as no longer owning such stock,

"(ii) any disposition of such stock by the person owning such stock, and

"(iii) any distribution of property in respect of such stock to the person holding such stock, shall be treated as a disposition by, or distribution to, the United States person with respect to the stock in the passive foreign corporation.

"(B) AMOUNT TREATED IN SAME MANNER AS PREVIOUSLY TAXED INCOME.—Rules similar to the rules of section 959(b) shall apply to any amount described in subparagraph (A) in respect of stock which the taxpayer is treated as owning under subsection (e).

"(C) COORDINATION WITH SECTION 951.—If, but for this subparagraph, an amount would be taken into account under section 1293 by reason of subparagraph (A) and such amount would also be included in the gross income of the taxpayer under section 951, such amount shall only be taken into account under section 1293.

"(3) DISPOSITIONS.—Except as provided in regulations, if a taxpayer uses any stock in a passive foreign corporation as security for a loan, the taxpayer shall be treated as having disposed of such stock.

SEC. 7123. MEASUREMENT AND REPORTING OF WELFARE DEPENDENCY.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that welfare dependency has reached threatening levels:

(1) In the period since 1960 the average annual caseload of the aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) program under title IV of the Social Security Act has quintupled.

(2) In 1990 there were on average almost twice as many households receiving aid to families with dependent children payments as the number of households and individuals receiving unemployment compensation benefits.

(3) Nearly one-quarter of children born in the period 1967 through 1969 were dependent on welfare (AFDC) before reaching age 18. For minority children this ratio approached three-quarters.

(4) At any given time one-quarter of school children are from single parent families, or households with neither parent. The National Assessment of Educational Progress has documented the educational losses associated with single parent or no parent households.

(5) Only one-quarter of father-absent families receive full child support and over one-half receive none.

(6) The average aid to families with dependent children benefit has declined by more than one-third since 1960.

(7) The burden of welfare dependency is an issue of necessary concern to women, who in overwhelming proportion are the heads of single parent families.

(8) The rate of welfare dependency is rising. However, the statistical basis on which to assess this national issue is wholly inadequate, much as the statistical basis for addressing issues of unemployment was inadequate prior to the Employment Act of 1946, which required the creation of the annual economic report of the President and the development of unemployment rates.

(b) CONGRESSIONAL POLICY.—The Congress hereby declares that—

(1) it is the policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to reduce welfare dependency to the lowest possible level, and to assist families toward self-sufficiency, consistent with other essential national goals;

(2) it is the policy of the United States to strengthen families, to ensure that children grow up in families that are economically self-sufficient and to underscore the responsibility of parents to support their children;

(3) the Federal Government should help welfare recipients as well as individuals at risk of welfare dependency to improve their education and job skills, to obtain access to necessary support services, and to take such other steps as may assist them to meet their responsibilities to become financially independent; and

(4) it is the purpose of this section to aid in lowering welfare dependency by providing the public with generally accepted measures of welfare dependency so that it can track dependency over time and determine whether progress is being made in reducing welfare dependency and enabling families to be self-sufficient.

(c) DEVELOPMENT OF WELFARE DEPENDENCY INDICATORS, RATES, AND PREDICTORS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Secretary of Agriculture (referred to in this section col-

(2) DEVELOPMENT.—The Secretary shall—

(A) develop—

(i) indicators and rates related to the level of welfare dependency in the United States; and

(ii) predictors that are correlated with welfare dependency;

(B) assess the data needed to report annually on the indicators, rates, and predictors, including the ability of existing data collection efforts to provide such data and any additional data collection needs; and

(C) not later than 2 years after the date of the enactment of this section, provide an interim report containing conclusions resulting from the development and assessment described in subparagraphs (A) and (B), to—

(i) the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives;

(ii) the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives;

(iii) the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives;

(iv) the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives;

(v) the Committee on Finance of the Senate;

(vi) the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate; and

(vii) the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the Senate.

(3) CONSIDERATIONS.—In developing the indicators, rates, and predictors, the Secretary shall consider the complexity of patterns of welfare dependency and self-sufficiency attainment, and the external factors, including the economy, that affect welfare dependency.

(d) ADVISORY BOARD ON WELFARE DEPENDENCY.—

(1) ESTABLISHMENT.—There is established an Advisory Board on Welfare Dependency (referred to in this section as the "Board").

(2) COMPOSITION.—The Board shall be composed of 12 members with equal numbers to be appointed by the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President. The Board shall be composed of experts in the fields of welfare research and statistical methodology, representatives of State and local welfare agencies, and organizations concerned with welfare issues.

(3) VACANCIES.—Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the Board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment for the position being vacated. The vacancy shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the duties of the Board.

(4) DUTIES.—Duties of the Board shall include—

(A) providing advice and recommendations to the Secretary on the development of indicators, rates, and predictors of welfare dependency, and the identification of data collection needs and existing data collection efforts, described in subsection (c)(2)(B); and

(B) providing advice on the development and presentation of the annual report on welfare dependency indicators, rates, and predictors required under subsection (e).

(5) TRAVEL EXPENSES.—Members of the Board shall not be compensated, but shall receive travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, at rates authorized for employees of agencies under subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, for each day the member is engaged in the performance of duties away from the home or regular place of business of the member.

(6) DETAIL OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES.—The Secretary shall detail, without reimbursement, any of the personnel of the agency to the Board to assist the Board in carrying out its duties. Any detail shall not interrupt or otherwise affect the civil service status or privileges of the Federal employee.

(7) VOLUNTARY SERVICE.—Notwithstanding section 1342 of title 31, United States Code, the Board may accept the voluntary services provided by a member of the Board.

(e) ANNUAL WELFARE DEPENDENCY REPORT.—

(1) PREPARATION.—The Secretary shall prepare an annual report on welfare dependency in the United States. The report shall attempt to identify indicators, rates, and predictors of welfare dependency and trends in dependency, and provide information and analysis on the causes of dependency.

(2) COVERAGE.—The report shall include analysis of families and individuals receiving assistance under means-tested benefit programs, including the program of aid to families with dependent children under part A of title IV of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 601 et seq.), the food stamp program under the Food Stamp Act of 1977 (7 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.), and the Supplemental Security Income program under title XVI of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1381 et seq.), or as general assistance under programs administered by State and local governments.

(3) CONTENTS.—Each report shall set forth—

(A) for each of the means-tested benefit programs described in paragraph (2)—

(i) current trends in the number and rates of recipients and the characteristics, including age, sex, marital status, presence of children, labor force participation, and disability, of the recipients; and

(ii) total expenditures;

(B) the proportion of the total population receiving each of the programs and patterns of multiple program participation and recipiency duration;

(C)(i) characteristics of each such program, including total expenditures broken down by Federal and State shares, gross income limit, need standards, and maximum potential benefit by State; and

(ii) a description of the interactions among the programs;

(D) in the case of the second, or a subsequent, report, changes in the information described in subparagraphs (A) through (C) from the previous year, and trends in program participation;

(E) annual numerical goals for recipients, and expenditures, within each program and within significant subgroups within the population, for the calendar year in which the report is transmitted and for each of the following 4 calendar years, which goals shall, consistent with other essential national goals, reflect the objectives of—

(i) reducing welfare dependency to the lowest possible level; and

(ii) increasing family self-sufficiency at or above the Federal poverty level to the greatest extent possible;

(F)(i) the programs and policies as the Secretary, in consultation with the Board, determines are necessary to meet the goals for each of the 5 years; and

(ii) such recommendations for legislation, which shall not include proposals to reduce eligibility levels or impose barriers to program access, as the Secretary may determine to be necessary or desirable to reduce welfare dependency; and

(G) interim goals for reducing the proportion of children, and families with children, who are recipients of aid to families with dependent children to 10 percent of families with children, adjusted for economic conditions.

(4) SUBMISSION.—The Secretary shall submit such a report not later than 3 years after the date of the enactment of this section, and annually thereafter, to the committees specified in subsection (c)(2)(C). The report shall be transmitted during the first 60 days of each regular session of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANCASTER). Pursuant to the rule, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 11, the bill now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. The people of this country are crying out to us, their Government, to stop the bickering, stop the gridlock, and be responsive to their needs. This bill is a bipartisan response to that cry. I urge my colleagues to support it enthusiastically, and I urge the President to sign it.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11 would provide significant relief to distressed areas, both urban and rural. It would extend several expiring tax provisions permanently and other expiring provisions for 18 months. It would include some important provisions previously passed by the House of Representatives and some passed by various subcommittees of the Committee on Ways and Means; and it would raise sufficient revenue to maintain deficit neutrality over the next 6 years.

More specifically, H.R. 11 would establish procedures for the designation of 50 tax enterprise zones—25 urban enterprise zones and 25 rural development investment zones. Zones could be designated through 1996 and, once designated, would be in effect for 15 years.

Special tax incentives would be available to businesses within each enterprise zone including a wage credit of 15 percent on wages up to $20,000 paid to each of their employees who lives and works within the zone.

Small businesses within a zone that meet certain requirements would be allowed additional expensing for purchases of equipment. More favorable loss deductions would be available for certain property and ownership interests in zone businesses. The rules for tax-exempt bound financing would be liberalized to expand zone businesses' access to capital.

Individual investors could defer tax on capital gains earned within the zone as long as they reinvested the proceeds in the zone, and could exclude 50 percent of capital gains on sales of certain new zone assets after a 5-year holding period. Finally, individuals who do not elect the capital gains exclusion could deduct up to $25,000 per year for the purchase of stock in a zone business.

H.R. 11 would also increase the Federal share of spending on the Job Opportunity and Basic Skills [JOBS] Program and would facilitate the States in obligating funds carried over from prior years. It would make more flexible jobs program participation rules for students.

The bill would also include the administration's proposal to permit State governments to exclude certain assets from AFDC limits in order to promote self-sufficiency among beneficiaries.

H.R. 11 would also provide for the permanent extension of the low-income housing credit, the targeted jobs credit, qualified mortgage bonds and mortgage credit certificates, and qualified small-issue bonds. Other expiring tax provisions would be extended for 18 months, that is, through December 31, 1993. These include the R&D credit, educational assistance, group legal services, and the minimum tax exemption for gifts of appreciated property.

The bill also provides for $2½ billion in block grants for the most distressed urban and rural areas of our country. This will enable additional domestic spending on vital social programs and law enforcement efforts within enterprise zones.

H.R. 11 includes many provisions previously passed by the House of Representatives, previously proposed by President Bush, and previously included in Republican substitutes to a variety of bills reported from the Committee on Ways and Means.

In this regard, the bill would relax the rules that apply to passive real estate investments, and would repeal the luxury tax on boats, airplanes, jewelry, and furs. In addition, the bill includes several provisions that were part of President Bush's original seven point economic program including passive loss relief for real estate, relief from the minimum tax for capital-intensive companies, and encouragement for pension plan investment in real estate.

Mr. Speaker, much misinformation has been passed around this Chamber about the so called intangibles legislation contained in this bill.

This bill provides major simplification regarding the tax treatment of intangibles. It provides that for newly acquired assets, all intangibles will be amortized over 14 years. It does not give a windfall for any past activities—including any mergers and acquisitions. It is only for the future.

And the provision is fair for the future. It eliminates much controversy today that is taking time of both companies and the IRS. It does this in a way that increases the write-off period for some assets and decreases it for others. The net simplification is revenue neutral and fair.

The bill also includes a package of more than 100 provisions that will simplify and streamline the tax-paying process for millions of taxpayers.

The bill provides for many technical corrections in the areas of tax, Social Security, human resources, and trade. Many of these provisions were included in H.R. 1555, which overwhelmingly passed the House last November.

The taxpayer bill of rights is also included in the bill. This would result in improved fairness in transactions between the IRS and the taxpaying public.

In order to finance the bill, H.R. 11 would require securities dealers to mark-to-market any securities held for inventory; would change the rules by which individuals and corporations pay estimated taxes; would deny the so-called double dip by savings and loans; would extend the higher current tax rates on the largest estates; and would cap allowable deductions for moving expenses at $5,000; along with several other miscellaneous provisions.

Mr. Speaker, I am sincerely hopeful that the President will sign this critically important bill. Several of the revenue raisers contained in the bill have been included in the President's budget and various Republican substitutes. In the interest of constructing a bill that the President can sign, the Ways and Means Committee was very careful to include the least controversial revenue raisers possible.

Mr. Speaker, I urge passage of H.R. 11 because it would do a great deal of good for a great number of Americans. I urge the support of my colleagues because more than the substantive policy contained in the bill is at stake. Also at stake is the ability of this institution to govern in the best interests of our constituents—the American people. As substantively important as this bill is, it is equally important that we demonstrate to our constituents, and to ourselves, that we can legislate and govern in their interest. H.R. 11 deserves strong bipartisan support, which I urge upon all my colleagues, and on the President of the United States.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in what I have to admit is a somewhat reluctant support of H.R. 11. I am reluctant because, while I am committed to helping this legislation move forward to the Senate, I have strong personal reservations about a number of its provisions. In normal circumstances, those reservations would cause me to oppose the bill. But these are not normal circumstances.

Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI has pointed out a number of the very positive provisions the bill contains—and it is a mixed bag. I agree that there is much good in it.

A key element of this bill is the President's enterprise zone program which he and its strongest proponent—my friend, HUD Secretary Jack Kemp—feel strongly must be given a chance to become law. I am pledged to help them in this step in that effort, and I intend to vote for this bill that will move the process forward to the Senate.

I must point out, however, several other provisions of H.R. 11 which I hope will be addressed by the Senate—and which must be addressed by the eventual conference committee on the bill if I am to support the final conference report.

In its present form, H.R. 11 would cause an entitlement sequester—principally Medicare—of nearly $8.5 billion in fiscal years 1993 through 1995. That has to be corrected in conference. I have been told that it will be vetoed. If it does not meet year by year pay-go requirements of the Budget Enforcement Act.

The country's poorest and bleakest areas deserve our attention—but they need the right kind of attention.

That is why I am disappointed that the incentives in the original administration proposal for revenue zones has been watered down to where it will not take the type of effect that I would like to see it take.

It extends other provisions for 18 months and extends one for 6 months. This to me is somewhat of an inequity, where some are picked and chosen and others are not given the same treatment.

In what can be viewed as a rebuke to small business owners, the Ways and Means Committee decided to retain for 5 additional years a 55 percent estate tax minimum rate. It is actually 60 percent effectively for some taxpayers. This was scheduled to phase down to 50 percent in 1985 and has been frozen at the instance of the majority year after year.

Confiscatory estate taxes deter capital formation and entrepreneurial business growth, and unfairly penalize small family businesses.

In addition, H.R. 11 imposes a $5,000 ceiling on the deduction of moving expenses. This averages, I am told, for families in this country $11,000. These families earn on average $30,000 in taxable income. This is an increase in their tax bill frequently where they have to move to change locations to find a new job.

One of the bill's other revenue sources is a change in estimated tax safe harbor rules for individuals.

It does correct last year's complex mess, but the price for corrections is that all taxpayers, even those under $75,000 now must pay 115 percent of last year's tax liability in order to take the safe harbor. It lengthens the depreciation for commercial property from 31½ years to 40 years, and that is extremely counterproductive of what we are trying to do, to stabilize real estate values.

Individual Members may not like the tax incentives that were provided by the Federal Government as part of the thrift acquisition, but they were in place. Mr. Speaker, we can question whether those tax provisions were too liberal at the time, but they were on the books when these S&L's were acquired. They were taken into consideration by the acquirer. Now to retroactively pull those out is really bad tax policy. It sets an awful precedent.

I also disagree with the provisions in H.R. 11 dealing with Suter versus Artist M., the Supreme court decision, because it perhaps unintendedly, but as I read it, promises the right to sue if any State plan requirement is not met. I think that is dangerously broad. There are literally hundreds of State plan requirements in the programs established by the Social Security Act, and beneficiaries, if they feel they have not gotten the benefit of those, can now sue the State. It opens the State up to tremendous litigation.

It is clear that I am uncomfortable with many of the provisions in the bill, but I will vote for it because I believe it needs to be moved forward, and I hope these can be corrected by the Senate or in conference.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California [Ms. WATERS].

Ms. WATERS. I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. I support this legislation because the cities are in trouble. My own community is in trouble. We are desperate for help.

I support enterprise zones as an experiment. I am not sure that they will work. I know that I have worked on this bill to create some funding for social programs and not simply have an enterprise zone that would simply give tax credits to the corporations. We have covered in this legislation job training, we also have community policing, child care investments and public housing, low-interest loan guarantees for cities. Is it enough? No, it is not. It is $2.5 billion. I think we need somewhere in the neighborhood of $30 billion to $40 billion to $50 billion to deal with the problems of the cities. Perhaps this is a beginning.

I want to say to the President of the United States of America he has got his enterprise zones. He has been able to give a whole lot of tax credits. We have created a new concept about what enterprise zones should be, by putting these social programs in here.

We need more money, we need more support. I have created a new program that will give stipends to young people from 17 to 30 who are in training, perhaps with support for the first time. Is it enough? No. Is it a beginning? Perhaps yes.

I am going to be watching this bill as it goes through the other body and when it comes back here with a conference report, to make sure that the money is in here for us to fund these programs. If it is not, I am not going to support a conference report.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROSE].

Mr. ROSE. I thank the committee chairman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], with regard to the taxpayer bill of rights that is included in H.R. 11, is it your understanding that the mitigation statutes of the Tax Code should be construed to do equity for taxpayers? More specifically, in a case where there has been an agreement, such as a form 870-AD waiver of restrictions on assessments, signed by the Secretary and by any person, which provides that the liability under the agreement will not be reopened in the absence of fraud, malfeasance, or misrepresentation of fact, is it your understanding that the Internal Revenue Service is not precluded from considering such an agreement as a determination under section 1313 of the Internal Revenue Code if it is satisfied that the Government's interests are adequately protected?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, yes, that is my understanding.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the committee, and I urge all of my colleagues to support H.R. 11.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCHULZE], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SCHULZE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in moderate support of the Revenue Act of 1992, H.R. 11.

My support is tempered by the knowledge that this is likely the last tax bill on which I will vote as a Member of Congress. This being the case, I certainly wish this bill addressed the real long-term economic reality of the American economy. Unfortunately, it does not.

H.R. 11 is another patchwork of tax provisions that could be described as confusing, obsolete, revenue grabs or special interest related. However, it is probably the best our divided Congress could do in a Presidential election year. This measure, my colleagues, is another indication of why the American people are fed up with Congress. Rather than developing a tax bill to stimulate the economy, to reduce the deficit, or to address fundamental flaws in our corporate tax system, we are again passing the buck on to the people and the bucks, as in dollars, to the tax lawyers.

While I do not much care for this bill, there are several items of note I'd like to recognize. First, essential changes in the alternative minimum tax will simplify corporate taxation and make our tax code more equitable for capital intensive businesses.

Second, the taxpayer bill of rights provisions from our oversight subcommittee clearly take another step forward in ensuring the IRS treats American taxpayers more fairly. We codify the portillo decision and improve citizen access to fair IRS treatment.

Finally, after years of foot-dragging, this measure calls for fair revisions to the passive-loss rules providing some relief to a beleaguered real estate industry. I hope this is not another example of the old adage—too little, too late.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, it is finally gratifying to see Congress acknowledge the need for enterprise zones. While the provisions are too limited for my liking, the compromise reached with the administration may bring prosperity to our blighted urban areas.

Having initiated enterprise zone legislation in the early 1980's with HUD Secretary Jack Kemp, I am glad to see that hope for Philadelphia, and especially Chester, PA, may be just around the corner. If we had acted 10 years ago, rather than today, perhaps urban decay in America would be a nightmare rather than reality.

To the people of our great Nation, to my constituents and to the people of Chester, I say this is not close to the best we can do—but it is about all that we can do this year.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

Mr. RANGEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from New York yield for just a moment?

Mr. RANGEL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to confirm that the Weed and Seed Program has a law enforcement component as well as a seed component, is that correct?

Mr. RANGEL. No question about it. But that specific program is not in the legislation before us today. The Weed and Seed Program at Justice is not part of this bill.

Mr. COUGHLIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RANGEL. But no question about it.

Mr. Speaker, let me say this, that this is a great opportunity for America to see what can work in the cities. It is when Republicans and Democrats, together recognize that we are paying over $300 billion a year in lost productivity, unnecessary health costs, drug treatment, exorbitant rates of incarceration and millions of people without jobs that we see this bill is nothing if we just talk about 50 enterprise zones. But this bill gives us an opportunity to start, for the first time investing in people, keeping our kids in school, giving them job training and giving them an opportunity to earn a living and become a part of the American dream. There are people who are talking about too much juice for the corporations. Let me explain this: That the corporations cannot get a tax credit unless, first, they go into the zone, second, they have a business, they hire people, and third, they are successful and they make a profit. Then and only then do you have a revenue shortfall. And if that shortfall is made by kids having a job, then I say it is worth it. It costs a heck of a lot less than sweeping up kids and putting them in jail. This bill is an experiment, an American experiment in the true spirit of our people.

I want to thank DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, who provided the leadership and took the risk. That is all that this is. Maybe on this side we will not have to use terms like weed and seed and enterprise zones; we will do it because it is the right thing to do.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH].

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to note my skepticism on the pure good will provision of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this measure has a number of extraordinarily positive features—such as enterprise zones—but I have to object as strenuously as possible to one ill-conceived provision: The reversal of long standing tax policy implicit in the establishment of a new tax deduction for purchased goodwill. The effect of this change in accounting for goodwill is to provide greater incentives for conglomeration, by creating, in effect, another egregious taxpayer subsidy for corporate takeovers.

There is a tendency in modern American politics to exaggerate perspective by hyperbolic rhetoric. Hence, an interpreter of modern international relations recently underscored his view of the impact of the dissolution of the Soviet empire by entitling an essay: "The End of History." At the risk of greater hyperbole, it is my view that for a Democratically controlled Congress to capitulate to the apostles of greed and, in an era of gaping deficits, provide a new tax loophole for corporate raiders symbolizes the end of liberalism.

American democracy is premised on free enterprise and the precept that citizens can be expected to have an economic as well as political stake in our society. The problem with this seemingly obscure tax deduction for purchased good will is that it gives incentives for the consolidation of old assets, not creation of new societal wealth, for the narrowing rather than widening of ownership of America. It is a ripoff for investment bankers, a tax break for those least in need.

By impelling takeovers of established businesses instead of providing incentives for entrepreneurial investment in new endeavors, it stultifies prospects for recovery and undercuts economic growth.

If this bill passes, as I assume it will overwhelmingly, I expect to work with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] to move expeditiously to seek legislative reversal of this breach of faith with the American liberal tradition.

What Congress should be doing is ending the tax deductibility of interest when applied to takeovers of large corporations rather than adding new incentives to conglomerate. It is the middle-class taxpayer, not the Wall Street investor, the producer of goods and services, not the manipulator of financial paper that deserves a break. American priorities must be righted.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCGRATH], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. Speaker, this is the last best chance that we have to get some provisions into the law which most of us agree would be beneficial to our economy. We have already articulated the benefits of the enterprise zone legislation part and parcel of this bill. I would like to dwell, if I might, on the minigrowth package in this bill. That would be the extension of the expiring tax credit provisions.

Mr. Speaker, this bill permanently extends the low income housing tax credit, the targeted jobs tax credit, the mortgage revenue bond tax credit, and the small issue IDB tax credit. It extends for 18 months provisions of the R&D tax credit, the educational assistance tax credit, the legal services tax credit and the 25-percent deduction for those who purchase their own health insurance. For the real estate industry that needs to be stimulated it restores the passive loss deduction. It repeals the luxury tax that we enacted some years ago which has been such a burden to small businesses.

All this is vis-a-vis some tax revenues that some of us do not like, some tax raisers there that some of us do not like, but which the administration has supported from time to time in their budget submissions.

On balance, Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill which needs to be perfected but which needs to be passed out of this House today so that the Senate and the conference can do its deliberations.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. My colleagues, I rise in support of this measure. I think this is the last opportunity that we will have in this Congress to extend some of the expiring tax provisions that have been mentioned, primarily the R&D tax credit, the tax credit for low-income rental housing, the targeted jobs credit, which is so important throughout the country, the qualified mortgage bonds and mortgage credit certificates and the qualified small issue bonds.

In addition to these expiring provisions, Mr. Speaker, we are extending for a shorter period of time the R&D tax credit, as well as the self-employment opportunity to deduct for health insurance, which I think should be made permanent, but we are extending it for 6 months.

Now, if we do not do this, then we shall not have the opportunity during this session to extend these expiring provisions.

Obviously each of us can find something wrong, if we want to, in this bill. We can find something that we do not like. But there are so many good things in this bill, and, second, this is a bill that will be signed by the President.

So, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to make certain that we pass this bill under suspension so that we can get it on over to the Senate and get it to the President. I say to my colleagues, "I urge your support of this H.R. 11."

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO].

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the important tax credits that are extended in H.R. 11. I also applaud the repeal of the so-called luxury tax that has cost so many jobs, especially in the boating industry.

It is long past time that permanent status was given to the tax credits for targeted jobs, low-income housing, mortgage revenue bonds, and small issue industrial development bonds. All of these tax credits are very important for individuals and businesses in California.

For example, the mortgage revenue bond program has raised millions of dollars to help bring the American dream within reach for tens of thousands of low- and moderate-income first-time homebuyers in California. Also, in California at least 60 percent of mortgage revenue bond proceeds must be used for new construction, creating jobs while also combating the high cost of homeownership.

I am also very supportive of the 18-month extensions for tax credits for research and development, employer-provided education, employer-provided legal services, and for charitable contributions of appreciated property. However, I believe that these credits, as well as the deduction for the cost of health insurance for our Nation's self-employed individuals, should be made permanent, too.

I also strongly support the repeal of the so-called luxury tax. I voted against the tax in 1990, and I will vote today for its repeal. This tax has not raised revenue, but has actually cost the Federal Government money. More importantly, the tax has cost the American economy thousands of jobs.

While I am encouraged by the committee's acknowledgement of the need for enterprise zones to help revitalize our Nation's economically depressed areas, I am disappointed that the proposal contained in this bill is weaker, and I believe will be less effective, than the enterprise zones being pushed by President Bush and HUD Secretary Jack Kemp.

Also, though I remain opposed to the current estate tax law, which is extended in this bill, I believe that the jobs and opportunities created by other provisions in H.R. 11 deserve support.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 11.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SUNDQUIST], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11. It has many features that have been described already that are important to this country: enterprise zones, passive loss, taxpayers bill of rights, and a number of other very important provisions.

Now it is not perfect, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER] said earlier, but I think it does contain some reasonable compromises, and I am hopeful that it will come back from the Senate and that in the conference it will be made even better.

So, I urge my colleagues to vote aye on this H.R. 11 piece of legislation.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GUARINI].

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. It contains many proven programs that will help our economy.

One provision that I want to call special attention to is the 18-month extension for educational assistance, a program that provides educational opportunities for working families. I would prefer to make it permanent. There was a bill that had 315 sponsors to do so. Hopefully this will happen in the future because we have to give more certainty to the people who are seeking education where they know where they stand year after year.

The bill also contains provisions to stop savings and loan operators from double dipping. Billions of dollars in tax writeoffs have gone to savings and loan operators who have been taking tax deductions when they have not lost any money. They have unfairly gained in this system, and that will stop.

Also in this bill is a number of extenders. They are the building blocks of our economy.

In the bill is help for our inner cities by urban enterprise zones and a comprehensive Weed and Seed Program that was referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

A young man hired at a company as a messenger is now working as an officer of that same company. A mail clerk has been promoted through the ranks to become vice president.

Sound implausible? It's not. These people are but two examples of the effectiveness of section 127—the income exclusion for employer-provided educational assistance.

Mr. Speaker, and distinguished colleagues—H.R. 11 contains an 18-month extension for this valuable provision which provides educational opportunities for hard-working Americans across our Nation.

The exclusion for employer-provided educational assistance ensures that workers are not taxed on the value of educational assistance provided by their employers. In this way—it opens the door for low-skill employees to gain the credentials that will enable them to advance from minimum-wage—minimum-skills jobs—into positions with a future.

The program is a unique partnership between the business community—workers—Government—and the educational community.

The workers who benefit from this provision are the ones who need it most—that 71 percent who earn less than $30,000 a year. And section 127 programs are already successfully in place in companies throughout the Nation.

The section 127 exclusion for employer-provided educational assistance is proven program—and it is particularly vulnerable to interruptions in status. For this reason—I had hoped that we would be able to make it permanent in this bill.

This was not possible—but I am hopeful that in the future—Congress will see fit to remove the potential for disruptions from this program—and provide more certainty to the workers who are trying to pursue an education. I might add that 315 Members of the House have already indicated their support for permanent status by cosponsoring legislation to make section 127 permanent.

The legislation before us today also contains my provision to stop S&L operators from double-dipping in the taxpayers pockets—that is taking tax deductions when they have not lost any money.

The S&L crisis is the biggest financial disaster in our Nation's history. The Government and the American taxpayers have already lost billions through this scandal. We can't change that—but at least—with this legislation—we are ending a tax abuse which is further bleeding the Treasury.

I have been fighting for over 1½ years to stop this double-dipping and I am delighted that my provision has been included in this bill. This will save the taxpayers several billion dollars.

Elimination of the double-dip is a real victory. Special interests must not be allowed to rip off the public.

Mr. Speaker, and distinguished colleagues—I urge your support for H.R. 11—its important provisions for employee education—the many other extenders that are the building blocks for our economy—and stopping the taxpayer ripoff by S&L operators.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BUNNING], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 11.

Mr. Speaker, I am thrilled that we have, at long last, gotten the enterprise zone concept off the ground and gotten it moving. And I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

I have been a big supporter of enterprise zones for many years. In fact, I helped enact a State enterprise zone program when I was in the Kentucky State Senate—and we have proven that it works on the State level.

Finally, we are putting the power and the purse of the Federal Government to work—in a long-term productive program—to stimulate the most economically stagnant areas of our Nation and get them back into production.

This is no sunshine cure-all—we are not throwing a fist full of money at a problem and then turning to other things as the Federal Government tends to do too often. This is more than a short-term reaction. This is a long-term commitment to growth and productivity in inner cities and bypassed rural areas alike.

And the amazing thing is that there are other features of this bill—over and above the enterprise zone section—that are very worthwhile and deserve support in their own right.

This bill includes a permanent extension of the research and development tax credit and the exclusion for employer-provided educational assistance, as well as the low-income housing tax credit, targeted jobs tax credit, and mortgage revenue bonds.

Also, this bill repeals the ill-advised luxury tax that was enacted in 1990. The luxury tax was a mistake from the beginning and this action to repeal it is simply recognition of that fact. It was designed to sock it to the rich but instead the luxury tax put thousands of working men and women out of work. This bill says "Good riddance" to a bad tax.

On a personal basis, I am very happy to see this bill include two matters that I have been working on quite a bit over the past year, the taxpayers bill of rights and amendments to the deceptive mailings act.

The taxpayers bill of rights provisions in the bill will provide much-needed protection for the Nation's taxpayers in their dealings with the IRS. The establishment of an independent taxpayer advocate should be a major step in the right direction. At long last, the individual taxpayer will have someone to help fight the tax man.

As the ranking Republican on the Social Security Subcommittee, I was also particularly gratified to see the amendments to the Deceptive Mailing Practices Act included in this bill. It is much needed. Cheating senior citizens out of their money with fear and lies is a major growth industry in our country. Hopefully, these amendments which toughen the civil penalties for misleading fund raising solicitations will help alleviate the problem.

Putting some teeth in the law should make the merchants of fear think twice.

In all, it is a very good bill. And to top it off, it is all revenue neutral. You can't beat that.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GRADISON], a respected member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GRADISON. Mr. Speaker, as this bill came from the Committee on Ways and Means, it provided a waiver from the provision of the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990. I am happy to report to my colleagues that the measure on which we will actually vote today will not have that waiver included. I am aware that there has been great concern among Members on both sides of the aisle about that provision, since in its present form this bill does not meet the requirements of the Budget Act on a year-by-year basis. Under the circumstances, with the Budget Act waiver removed, there is absolutely no question in the mind of this Member that the conference report, when it comes back to us, will be so crafted as to prevent a sequester by meeting the requirements of the Budget Enforcement Act of 1990.

Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am enthusiastically supporting this measure, and I want to especially thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], and the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] for their assistance in reaching this result.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. I particularly want to call the Members' attention to title V of this bill, the taxpayer bill of rights 2. This is a most important provision which will be of genuine assistance to the average taxpayer who is honestly trying to comply with the tax law, but who somehow slips through the cracks of the tax system.

The very first provision of this taxpayer bill of rights establishes a new position of taxpayers' advocate within the IRS. This advocate is to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The advocate is required to report to the Congress, so that we who are held accountable for the actions of the IRS, might better know what is going on down there. The advocate is required to make these reports directly to the Congress so that his voice on behalf of the everyday-working American taxpayer will never be swallowed up in the halls of the IRS bureaucracy.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to creating the position of taxpayer advocate, this bill makes changes in over 40 different areas of tax administration. As my time is short, I will share with the Members just some of the most important of these new taxpayer safeguards. The bill before the House today:

First, it establishes a taxpayers' advocate, nominated by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and reporting directly to the Congress, with expanded authority to issue taxpayer assistance orders to force the IRS to act on behalf of taxpayers;

Second, it allows the Federal courts to hold IRS employees personally liable if the court finds that the proceeding against a taxpayer resulted from any arbitrary, capricious, or malicious act of the IRS employee. It further allows a taxpayer to sue the Government for up to $1 million for damages resulting from an IRS employee's reckless or intentional disregard of the tax laws or regulations.

Third, it provides relief in case involving temporary and proposed regulations, by limiting the circumstances under which these regulations are given retroactive effective dates.

Fourth, it requires that if a taxpayer asserts a reasonable dispute about the accuracy of an information return, the IRS must take reasonable steps to determine the validity of these returns, and present reasonable evidence supporting any tax deficiency based on the information return. This provision helps taxpayers in cases similar to the situation addressed by the Federal court in the Portillo decision.

Fifth, it provides additional notice and protection for taxpayers who are determined to be responsible officers in Federal tax deposit situations;

Sixth, it improves installment agreements by requiring prior notice of their cancellation, allowing for administrative appeals, and suspending certain penalties while they are in effect;

Seventh, it expands the authority of the IRS to abate interest payments and gives taxpayers 45 days after receiving a notice of additional tax due to pay the tax without further interest;

Eighth, it improves the procedures concerning liens, levies, and offers-in-compromise;

Ninth, it requires the inclusion of the payer's telephone number on information returns, and gives the taxpayer a civil cause of action if an information return is fraudulently filed;

Tenth, it requires the IRS to improve its forms and notices concerning changes of address, divorce, and the payment of employee withholding and payroll taxes;

Eleventh, it requires the IRS to study and report on better ways to serve taxpayers with special needs, the taxpayer rights education program, and the misconduct of IRS employees, and also requires the IRS to conduct a pilot program for taxpayer appeals of collection and enforcement actions;

Twelfth, it requires the GAO to study and report on the accuracy of IRS forms and notices, and the operations of the IRS employee suggestions programs.

Mr. Speaker, I support H.R. 11, and I think this taxpayer bill of rights is one of the most important aspects of this bill. At a time when partisan passions are running high, this taxpayer bill of rights is the result of true bipartisan work. As part of an earlier tax bill, it has already been given favorable consideration by the Senate. I recognize that this is not the cure for all taxpayer problems, and I know our efforts to protect the legitimate interests of taxpayers are by no means over. But, this is a good, responsible package and I strongly urge that it be favorably acted upon today.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY].

Are you one of the 401 cosponsors of my legislation to make the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program permanent? If so, you should support H.R. 11.

Have you cosponsored legislation to extend the low-income housing credit, the targeted jobs tax credit or small-issue bonds? In an effort to help your cities, these important programs would be made permanent. So if you want to help the cities, you should support H.R. 11.

Other important extenders like the research and development, gifts of appreciated property, employer provided educational assistance, and group legal services, would be extended for 18 months. If you support these extenders, you should support H.R. 11.

In addition, this bill contains a compromise enterprise zone proposal. While many of you ultimately may not like this proposal, let me say this is a concept I have supported for many years. Let's give this idea a chance.

Support H.R. 11.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. MACHTLEY].

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this bill. It is the end of the luxury tax.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SANTORUM].

Mr. SANTORUM. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. Although there are many worthy provisions in this bill, I would like to call to my colleagues' attention one provision that I have long advocated—the repeal of the so-called luxury tax on boats costing over $100,000.

Mr. Speaker, repeal of this onerous tax means jobs, jobs, jobs for the tens of thousands of unemployed boatworkers who were thrown out of work by this tax and a lingering recession. Passage of this bill will be a significant shot in the arm for our Nation's boat building industry, which is in a severe slump.

As my colleagues will recall, I previously introduced a bill, the Boating Jobs Preservation Act of 1991, H.R. 951, which would repeal the luxury tax on boats. H.R. 951 currently has a total of 181 cosponsors.

The companion bill in the Senate, S. 649 has 32 cosponsors, including majority leader GEORGE MITCHELL. The Senate last month passed a repeal of the luxury boat tax as part of an unemployment benefits bill. President Bush also supports this effort.

Mr. Speaker, the evidence is overwhelming—the boat tax is a failure and a plague the Congress visited upon an important American industry. Instead of raising revenue, it probably costs the Federal Government revenues through lost income taxes and added unemployment. Instead of making rich people pay more taxes, it instead threw blue-collar Americans out of work.

The boat tax invited predatory foreign competitors to prey on our weakened boat market. It destroyed small businesses that make up most of our domestic boat building and boat selling industry.

It is heartening to know that today common sense will finally prevail over the empty rhetoric that this tax was levied just to soak the rich. This issue was never about tax fairness, or making the rich guy pay more taxes, or even supply-side economics. It was about American jobs, pure and simple. The 19,000 American workers who lost their jobs as a result of the tax did not have the same option. This is a great day for our boating industry.

I would like to commend just a few of my colleagues who supported my effort to repeal the boat tax early on, before it was politically fashionable to do so. This noble group includes: The distinguished majority whip, Mr. BONIOR, who saw another proud Michigan industry decline, the automobile industry, and was determined not to let the same thing happen to the boating industry; the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], who sought to save small, family-owned boat building businesses in her home State; Mr. HUGHES, who represents the Jersey shore area, and who worked tirelessly for repeal of this destructive tax; and all my colleagues from my home State of Florida, where boating is such a vital component to the well-being of our State economy.

Mr. Speaker, the jury is in, and the boat tax has been judged an abject failure. Let us get rid of this disaster by voting for passage of H.R. 11.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to taking a tax off of millionaire boat buyers and putting it on middle-class boatowners with the diesel fuel tax.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 11. This bill does not help the poor, it simply robs middle-class Americans to give to the rich.

Do not be misled by the pittance that is being offered to rebuild our urban areas. The proposed program is a sham. The bill authorizes $2.5 billion over 5 years for so-called enterprise zones. The creation of enterprise zones was originally intended to provide assistance to distressed urban areas; what is being proposed today does not even come close to providing those troubled areas with what they need. If you take the meager amount of money that this bill authorizes, spread it out over 5 years, divide it by the 50 enterprise zones that the bill creates, and further cut that number in half, you will get the amount of money that urban areas will actually be receiving. Believing that this urban aid package is going to solve the crisis faced by our inner cities is like giving a baby aspirin to a cancer victim and telling him he's cured.

The American people should understand this legislation for what it is: Yet another raid on the Treasury by the rich and famous. It's bad enough that we are only willing to spend less than the third of the cost of a new bomber to help our cities, but what is even worse is that we're willing to do so only if we provide a whole new set of tax breaks for the wealthiest Americans. Is it too much to ask of millionaires that they pay the same tax rate on the interest income that working Americans must pay on their wages? I guess so, because before we can provide the pittance this legislation offers our cities, we must first reduce capital gains rates. Under this legislation, millionaires will pay only half the taxes on capital gains for investments in an enterprise zone that the workers in those zones will pay on their wages. What this says is, before we can help the poor we must provide welfare for the rich. While there are individual provisions within H.R. 11 that I could otherwise support, this bill on the whole is not just inadequate, it is unfair.

There are other provisions in H.R. 11 that I object to. One provision, in particular, merits public attention. Buried within this legislation is a provision to exempt companies such as Federal Express from the requirements of the nondiscrimination rules of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act [ERISA]. Effectively, H.R. 11 eliminates the requirement that separate pension plans for pilots must be the product of bona fide collective bargaining. This provision is bad policy. Earlier this year, this same provision had been included in H.R. 4210. Along with 44 colleagues, I notified the Speaker that I could not support the conference report on H.R. 4210 if the Federal Express provision was included. At the time, not only was this misguided and misbegotten provision dropped from H.R. 4210, but I was given assurances by the leadership that the provision would not be raised again. Now, not only is it being brought back to the floor as part of H.R. 11, but it is being brought up on the suspension calender so that it is not subject to amendment. As I indicated in March, when H.R. 4210 was under consideration, I strongly oppose this provision.

Prior to enactment of ERISA, it was common practice to establish one pension plan for a few preferred employees and another pension plan for everyone else. The one plan paid exceptionally generous benefits, while the other offered substantially inferior benefits. Because these plans received preferential tax treatment, a majority of workers were discriminated against while subsidizing the scheme of the privileged with their tax dollars. That is the policy we will return to if we fail to defeat H.R. 11.

Leave aside the issue that we are being asked to undermine the legitimate efforts of workers to organize. Leave aside the fact that we are being asked to actively discourage workers from exercising protected rights under our labor laws. Should the clerks, the baggage handlers, the secretaries, or the machinists be forced to use their tax dollars to underwrite retirement benefits that their employer has unilaterally chosen to offer others and deny to them? Should the Congress endorse a policy that amounts to stealing from the poor to give to the rich? If you agree that this is bad policy, I urge you to vote with me against H.R. 11.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ORTON].

Mr. ORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11 with our major caveat. I have deep concern about the authorization of goodwill under section 179.

The present law certainly is complex and has resulted in much litigation. However, an unlimited amortization deduction of this previously nondeductible intangible asset could lead to enormous losses to the Treasury as large businesses undergo mergers, acquisitions, and leveraged buyouts.

I submit that the placement of a cap limit on the value of goodwill subject to amortization will provide simplicity in the Internal Revenue

Code and allow small business the tax deductions for this asset, but will not open a loophole which we will regret.

A limit of $100,000 to $250,000 on section 179 goodwill would appropriately allow small business deductions, resolve most of the litigation on this issue, and not bankrupt the U.S. Treasury.

I sincerely hope the conference committee will favorably consider this recommendation.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, international competitiveness studies, one as recently as a week ago, show that the United States is paying the price for the neglect of our cities and our rural areas. We are falling behind other countries, and fast. We have fallen from No. 2 to No. 5 in just a year. One in eight Americans and one in five children live in poverty. The economic status of our Nation will only rise when the status of our families and our children rise.

Mr. Speaker, I want my own State of California to be the Golden State again, and I want the American dream to be possible for all our people. We do not guarantee results around here, but we have got to begin again to guarantee opportunity. This bill is a start, it is a beginning, and I urge all Members to vote aye today.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPTON].

Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this legislation as it includes provisions establishing enterprise zones and more funds for Weed and Seed.

My home town in Michigan includes Benton Harbor. Benton Harbor is a State enterprise zone due to its level of distress—very high unemployment and large numbers of folks on welfare.

Mr. Speaker, just in recent months we have seen more than 100 businesses locate or expand their employment in that zone.

Mr. Speaker, if it works in Benton Harbor it will work in the rest of the country. This is an idea whose time has finally come. I also rise in support of the legislation expanding Weed and Seed. For the last 18 months I have helped with a group of respective active local leaders in Benton Harbor to try to solve the problems of crime and drugs. I helped establish a crime and drugs task force that wants to focus on the cause of the problems stemming from crime and drugs. Better social services, job training, and education all compose the "seed" element of this program. Consequently the community recognized that this can be an answer to decay in urban/rural areas.

Mr. Speaker, on Monday next, Digger Phelps will be in Benten Harbor to look firsthand at the problems of Benten Harbor and what the community is trying to do to change the course. Digger is the President's pointman for the Weed and Seed Program.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all my colleagues to support this legislation as a cure for economic decay for our urban/rural areas. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], our respected Republican leader of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the compromise reached to strengthen the enterprise zone provisions of H.R. 11 and to add the Weed and Seed Program to this legislation.

Before I touch on the specifics, let me say: I hope this urban-rural initiative is undertaken with a sense of our own limitations.

Government alone cannot rebuild urban and rural areas that need help.

Only the citizens of a community can do that.

Only the combination of individual responsibility and transcendent values can provide the leadership.

But, what we are doing can be of some help, so I favor it.

The enterprise zone provisions in this bill creates 50 zones, half in distressed urban areas and the other half in distressed rural areas.

There are tax incentives not only to spur capital investment in designated enterprise zones, but also to encourage employers to hire employees who live within such zones.

The compromise adds a 50 percent exclusion from the capital gains tax for assets held for at least 5 years, in addition to the capital gains rollover provisions already in the bill.

The compromise further provides $500 million of new funding to provide intensive crime and drug fighting assistance to weed out gang leaders, violent criminals, and drug dealers from distressed neighborhoods.

This law enforcement effort would be accompanied by what is called a seed component: job training, drug treatment, and prevention, educational activities, and infrastructure improvements.

The administration supports the improvements to the Revenue Act of 1992 which have been agreed to.

Although H.R. 11 still has some problems which must be worked out in conference, such as the large revenue losses, the bill contains many beneficial provisions.

Specifically we are repealing the luxury tax which cost jobs for those manufacturing such so-called luxury items; and it provides passive loss relief to the real estate industry which will give a shot in the arm to that industry; it extends the list of tax provisions that expired yesterday which are so important to many of our small businessmen. Failure to provide these extensions would have a negative impact on our economy just at the time that the economy is beginning to grow again.

H.R. 11 permanently extends the targeted jobs tax credit which allows employers to continue to hire economically disadvantaged individuals.

It also permanently extends the low-income housing credit, the mortgage revenue bond provisions and small issue development bond provisions.

I would still like to see a permanent extension of the research and development tax credit which is only extended 18 months in this legislation.

Permanent extension of the research and development credit is so important to the competitive position of our country.

I am also troubled that the bill only contains a 6-month extension of the 25-percent deduction of health insurance costs for self-employed individuals.

But, the major purpose of this legislation—to provide much-needed relief to the distressed and disadvantaged areas of our Nation—is so important that I ask my colleagues to support this bill.

I am confident that the problems still remaining with the bill will be worked out as it moves through the legislative process.

Let us move it forward and get it on the President's desk in a form that he can sign.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. NEAL].

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in the last few months in this Chamber we have heard a lot of squabbling about a domestic agenda and that enough is not being done for our cities. Today, we have the opportunity to vote for a measure that sends a message to our cities. And this message is we have not forgotten about them.

Just think, during the last decade, we have eliminated the revenue sharing program, we have eliminated the UDAG program, we have cut back dramatically in CDBG allocations.

Our urban areas are faced with difficult problems and for our cities to survive we have to take action now. I am not just referring to large cities as Los Angeles, Boston, New York, and Detroit. Smaller cities are faced with the same problems. From my experiences as the former mayor of Springfield, MA, I have firsthand knowledge of the problems facing our cities.

No matter what their size, American cities are faced with the flight of the middle class and the lack of new development in urban areas. Also, businesses are starting to flee to the suburbs. We need to take action to keep businesses in our cities. For this reason, I have been a longtime supporter of enterprise zones.

We have tried other programs for our cities such as direct grants. Why don't we give enterprise zones a chance? Enterprise zones have been a successful tool of State economic development. Currently, 36 States have enterprise zone programs. Enterprise zones takes a logical approach to helping our cities. It provides benefits to both communities and businesses. The benefits to the community are businesses would be investing in urban areas and the program would create new jobs. The benefit to businesses is that they receive tax incentives for investing in urban areas.

We will hear that this program does not go far enough. We are faced with difficult financial constraints and we have to carefully choose what programs are the right programs for now. I am sure a lot of us would like to see more aid to our cities. But during this time, the current enterprise zone program is a reasonable and responsible approach. If enterprise zones are successful, we can expand the program.

In recent years, I have been disturbed by the deteriorating conditions of downtown areas of our cities. American cities are our backbone and they should be a source of great pride to us. Let us give enterprise zones a chance to improve our cities.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRANDY], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GRANDY. Mr. Speaker, I supported the unemployment compensation conference report and I will support H.R. 11. I encourage my colleagues to do the same if for no other reason than it is a historic day when this Congress can agree to subsidize job loss and job creation in the same day.

That is exactly what is happening with this combination of bills that are brought before us today. Let me say one thing specifically, though, to rural colleagues. This is a better deal than we probably could have expected. To assume that there will be 25 zones in urban areas and rural areas that will share equally in the spoils that will be derived to pay for this particular provision is a rare break and a rare parity for rural communities.

I would also add that unlike most Federal formulas, this time rural criteria is different from urban criteria. The qualifications that were outlined in the bill presented by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. DORGAN] and myself for rural development investment zones mentioned those specific criteria, and they are in this bill today. What am I talking about? Mr. Speaker, in rural areas poverty is a phantom. One cannot measure it through welfare rules and poverty statistics or through unemployment insurance, because so many people are unemployed but self-employed.

Under this bill we will use the proper measurements of out-migration, in other words, people that have left rural areas and have never come back, and simultaneously jobs that have gone and will not come back. Those criteria are in this bill. That is an important precedent for rural communities and their growth.

As we begin what is admittedly an experiment of trying to combine economic growth provisions with social welfare renewal provisions, I think that we have struck a good bargain here; not a perfect bargain, not one that does not need to be worked out in conference, but in addition to the other rural provisions, such as the extension, the permanent extension of private activity bonds which will, among other things, in Iowa extend the beginning farmer program, very important for our younger producers, and extend self-employed deductibility for self-employed individuals, such as farmers who are trying to buy their health insurance, we have struck a good balance.

Coincidentally today, I looked at the Iowa unemployment statistics and they are up, sadly. But the good news is, our employment statistics are up, too. Ten thousand more people are employed in our State this year than last, which means they are coming home. With this bill we give the opportunity for other individuals to go back home and start again, and I am pleased that they will be returning to rural communities as well as urban communities under H.R. 11. I urge the support of the Congress.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 11.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN].

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, to those worried about the intangibles goodwill provision, please listen. No. 1, the retroactivity has been removed. No. 2, listen to the words of a senior specialist at CRS, and this is what she says: "In the aggregate, there is no reason to expect that there will be any overall price effect. Certain firms which had relatively more amortizable assets would have a small increase in the sales price purchasers are willing to pay, while other firms that are already writing off assets will have a small decrease," so there are these protections in terms of any increase or tax incentives for takeovers.

There is a third provision just in case. The Treasury Department is ordered to undertake annual studies to see if this bill might stimulate takeovers, and if that were to happen, and the specialists say it will not, then we could act.

I strongly urge support of this bill.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentlewoman from New York [Ms. SLAUGHTER].

Ms. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11's provision that would make permanent that tax exemption for manufacturing industrial development bonds.

The Department of Labor reports that nearly 10 million workers are currently unemployed—the highest number since 1983. We need to do something to boost job creation, and we need to do something now. That is why I so strongly support IDB's the only Federal program directly targeted to the manufacturing backbone of our economy.

By providing a sound, responsible, reliable means of development and expansion capital, IDB's have played a critical role in manufacturing job growth in smaller firms. In the Greater Rochester area alone, IDB-financed projects have created more than 1,600 new jobs over the last 4 years.

This marks the second time this year that the House has recognized the job creation and economic stimulus potential of a permanent extension of the IDB Program. Local economic development agencies must have a longer planning horizon than, 6, 12, or 18 months if the maximum number of jobs are going to be created. I urge my colleagues in the House, the Members of the Senate, and the President to approve a permanent extension for IDB's and send some good news to the American worker for a change.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I oppose the bill. The bill is half good and half bad. Where I come from, that is mediocre. We have mediocre legislation and mediocre government. I also oppose it for another reason. It is token. If we give $12 billion coming up to Russia, $13 billion in foreign aid and $2.5 billion for our cities, all we have done in the last 10 years is take the reservations and the plantations and move them into the damn city.

I say this: Congress should reinstate revenue-sharing and put some of our dollars into our cities, not just token tax breaks.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI].

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

On behalf of the citizens of Louisville and Jefferson County, I thank the gentleman for having put this bill on the floor and for his urban enterprise zones, for the extension of the various tax credits for low-income housing, mortgage revenue bonds, and targeted jobs tax credits. This is an excellent piece of legislation.

Once again, on behalf of the citizens of my community, I thank the gentleman for bringing this bill up. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 11. This legislation is the second piece of an urban aid package to be passed by the 102d Congress in the wake of the Los Angeles riots. Congress passed the first part of this package back on June 22, 1992, when it enacted a measure that appropriated $1.3 billion in disaster relief and funds for summer jobs for youth in our inner cities. My community of Louisville and Jefferson County will receive $1.5 million in assistance from these funds which will contribute to the creation of 750 summer jobs for teens in my community.

I am under no illusions that this previous aid, nor the bill we are about to pass, are the sole answers to the problems of our inner cities. But, part of our task is to create jobs and sustain economic development in the inner cities of our country where there is simply none now. Currently, a State enterprise zone has helped create thousands of jobs in Louisville and Jefferson County. It is my hope that H.R. 11 will help to accomplish that task as well, particularly in the most economically devastated areas of Louisville.

I took a walking tour through one of these areas—the Parkland neighborhood of Louisville—a few weeks ago at the invitation of Rev. Louis Coleman, Alderman Bill Wilson, and State Representative Porter Hatcher. We toured impoverished and blighted areas of the community—areas crying out for investment and jobs. I am pleased that under this legislation, Louisville will be able to apply to designate the area I toured as part of a Federal enterprise zone.

H.R. 11 also provides investment in the human capital of our inner cities by authorizing $2.5 billion for job training, education, community development, and crime prevention in distressed areas. This is the so called Weed and Seed portion of the bill. Again, more is needed but H.R. 11 provides the foundation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11 also makes permanent a variety of tax credits that have served the people of Louisville and Jefferson County well. According to James Allen, director of Louisville's Department of Housing and Urban Development, the low-income housing tax credit—now made permanent under H.R. 11—has been utilized to help create hundreds of housing units in Louisville since 1986.

The Mortgage Revenue Bond Program is made permanent under H.R. 11. It has assisted low- and middle-income families in my community by reducing the cost of mortgages for first time home buyers. In short it helps give these families a piece of the rock.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11 extends permanently the targeted jobs tax credit, a tax credit that encourages employers in my community and around the country to hire economically disadvantaged youth. No doubt this tax provision has the potential to help the economically disadvantaged youth of our inner cities as well.

Mr. Speaker, again H.R. 11 is not a panacea to our urban problems, but it is a good start and I support it enthusiastically.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, this bill does give hope to some people out in America. I want people to know this bill also should give hope to our colleagues here in the House. In the 1986 tax bill passive loss was removed. I thought it was wrong at that time. Real estate is one of the very few true economic engines of our economy.

I introduced legislation in the 100th Congress, the 101st Congress, in the 102d Congress, along with my colleague, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ANDREWS], with 326 cosponsors, and the President supporting passive loss. We have it now in a bill that can be signed.

I want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER], the ranking member, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], for putting in a bill that can be signed, passive loss.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER Mr. Speaker, I am one of those Members seriously worried about the goodwill provisions of this bill. In fact, I want before the Committee on Rules with the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY] to strike those provisions in this bill. Despite my inability today to offer my amendment, I think overall this is a good bill and Members should support it. I plan at a later date on working on the goodwill section of this legislation, but for today we need to support this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am here to request that the rule for House consideration of H.R. 11, allow for an amendment to be offered by myself and Congressman MCCURDY on the amortization of intangible assets.

Specifically, our amendment would remove goodwill and going concern value from the list of intangible assets the Ways and Means Committee bill would allow to be amortized for tax purposes. It would not change the 14-year amortization period for other intangibles.

The intangibles provision now in H.R. 11 is touted as tax simplification, and there is no doubt that it would put an end to $9 billion in disputes between the IRS and corporate taxpayers. The problem is that the committee's approach to simplification is to accept defeat and give business everything it wanted. Mr. Speaker, in our current fiscal crisis this is a billion dollar solution we simply cannot afford.

Right now when one business acquires another, it may take tax deductions as the value of the property it acquired depreciates over time. The IRS also allows for certain intangible assets to be depreciated if they have a limited useful life and an ascertainable value. However, no depreciation deductions are allowed for goodwill or going concern value.

The unfortunate result of this policy is that creative corporate tax lawyers have come up with no fewer than 159 intangible assets for which they have sought deductions. Many of these so-called assets are shameless corporate attempts to write off as much of their takeover costs as they can. According to GAO, in 70 percent of the cases in which businesses have claimed tax deductions for intangibles, the IRS has found that the assets were in fact goodwill and not amortizable.

Faced with the legal quagmire that has resulted from appeals of these IRS rulings, the Ways and Means Committee decided we should give up and allow corporations to write off everything. This is bad tax policy and bad fiscal policy.

Allowing corporate write-offs for purchased goodwill creates a blatant taxpayer subsidy for corporate takeovers. I'm no opponent of takeovers. Takeovers can be a valuable check on corporate inefficiency. However, this provision gives billions of dollars in taxpayer-financed incentives for takeovers that would not otherwise be economically justified.

Talking to the New York Times one Wall Street analyst predicted this measure "would be a huge boon. I would say you would see a billion-dollar deal announced in weeks if it goes through." So much for neutral tax policy.

The same analyst also predicted, "The takeover values of food companies would go up 20 percent overnight." That's great for owners of food companies, but it's taxpayers who will foot the bill.

A Joint Tax Committee memo which I have attached to my statement predicts that the proposal will "lose significant revenue after the budget period." While the lengthened amortization period for other intangibles would increase revenue in the early years, "the revenue loss attributable to deductions for goodwill would not decrease over time," according to Joint Tax.

No revenue estimate has been developed for the goodwill provision alone, but we know that the IRS is currently in court trying to collect $9 billion in back taxes for assets it has found to be goodwill or going concern value. It is reasonable to assume that allowing goodwill to be amortized will cost the Treasury billions of dollars each year.

During the debate over the balanced budget amendment there was a lot of talk about not delaying the tough decisions on how to reduce the deficit. If we allow this provision to become law, we are ducking yet another tough choice. Someday we are going to have to start saying "no." Saying "no" now is going to be a lot easier than saying "yes" and having to take it away later.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON TAXATION,
Washington, DC.

Memo to:
Subject: Revenue Estimate Request.

For your information, it is our opinion that the proposal would lose significant revenue after the budget period, particularly if the growth in the acquisitions of intangible assets abates. This revenue loss is primarily attributable to the proposal's allowance of amortization deductions for goodwill, which is not amortized under present law. While allowing amortization deductions for goodwill can be approximately "paid for" during the budget window by lengthening the time over which other intangible assets are amortized, the revenue raised by a lengthened amortization period for other assets would be eroded by vintaging effects, while the revenue loss attributable to deductions for goodwill would not decrease over time.

FOR THIS CHRISTMAS-IN-JULY, YOU COULD BE FOOTING THE BILL

(By Robert Kuttner)

Here's a hot idea that deserves a quick burial: Let's increase the federal debt by an estimated $3.6 billion to have taxpayers subsidize another round of leveraged buyouts. This is precisely what would be allowed under tax legislation greased for quick passage some time in June. Present law lets companies deduct the cost of tangible assets purchased in corporate buyouts. The acquiring company may also deduct interest costs on borrowed money. This tax subsidy was generous enough to stimulate the unpredented buyout wave of the 1980s, which cost taxpayers upwards of $80 billion and had consequences that were at best mixed.

The proposed new law, H.R. 3035, would allow for the first time the deduction of intangible goodwill. The Internal Revenue Service currently disallows such deductions. According to then IRS Commissioner Fred T. Goldberg Jr., acquisitors have tried to take tax deductions for at least 159 different categories of intangibles. These range from arguably legitimate assets, including copyrights, trademarks, and dealer networks, to a variety of pie-in-the sky write-offs such as having "underdeveloped competition" and even "nonunion status."

APPEALS APLENTY

This Christmas-in-July proposal is being pushed by a coalition of Wall Street firms that promote LBOs and by corporations, such as Philip Morris Cos., which want the change in the law to be retroactive, so they can reap tax windfalls on buyouts already consummated. In 1987, the House passed a bill explicitly prohibiting deduction of goodwill, but the bill was opposed by the Reagan Administration and died in the Senate.

Meantime, some 2,000 appeals have been filed in connection with corporate buyouts, challenging the IRS position. Lower courts have issued contradictory rulings on the question, the Supreme Court has agreed to review it, and the takeover crowd is nervous the high court will back the IRS. The Administration supports the proposed bill. The IRS opposes the whole concept, but Goldberg, as a loyal member of the Administration, has testified in support on grounds that it would at least clarify the law. "From a tax administrator's perspective, the present situation is untenable because it embroils the government in endless factual inquiries," Goldberg testified to the House Ways & Means Committee, adding that some $8.5 billion worth of proposed tax adjustments are now on appeal in the courts. Goldberg calculates the government has spent an average of 6,000 staff hours and $160,000 in out-of-pocket costs per case.

But from the perspective of a company seeking tax write-offs or a Wall Street house promoting mergers and acquisitions, the costs of litigation and lobbying are well worth it. House Ways & Means Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who led the fight in 1987 to deny deductions for corporate goodwill, now supports the proposal. Says James Jaffe, a Rostenkowski aide: "This proposal comes mainly out of the 'tax-wonk' community—the Treasury and the tax bar. The corporate guys and the IRS are both spending a lot of money to litigate this, so why don't we just come up with a relatively simple rule?"

SHEER WASTE

Jaffe says Rostenkowski tried to simplify the rule by prohibiting the deduction but lacked the votes. The chairman now favors simplifying it. But this was hardly the brainchild of tax wonks. Big money is at stake, and the lobbying coalition includes upwards of 20 corporations involved in M&As, including Citicorp, Honeywell, Gillette, Quaker Oats, and Levi Strauss—several of whose political action committees have contributed to both parties. Philip Morris, among other courtesies to the Democrats, donated generously to the anti-term-limit initiative in Washington state, which would have ended the career of Speaker of the House Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.).

Arbitrage specialists have been quoted as saying the law, if enacted, would set off another merger boom and drive up the share price of potential target companies. If so, the legislation is sheer economic waste, since that run-up would be subsidized directly by taxpayers. Critics such as Robert S. McIntyre of Citizens for Tax Justice suggest that the legislation's backers are lobbying for the tax bailout mainly because they overpaid for many of their target companies in previous mergers and now are hoping the taxpayer will make up the difference. McIntyre urges that the laws be toughened to remove some of the existing tax-subsidy of M&As, notably the ability to deduct interest costs. "In the case of a takeover financed by very risky junk bonds," McIntyre argues, "the interest payment is really more like a dividend, which is not deductible."

This little episode is emblematic of what ails the economy and public finances. Both parties say they want to reduce the deficit, but neither can resist pandering to special interests. The forces representing the public's interest in fiscal discipline are outgunned. The Administration says it believes in free markets, but when those markets produce costly mistakes, it uses taxpayer money for expensive bailouts. And industry, instead of investing in new products and better management, finds it more cost-effective to invest in litigation and lobbying. No wonder America has trouble competing.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HALL].

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. I would like to commend the gentleman from Illinois for his leadership and hard work on this legislation. Through his leadership, enterprise zones will be created in troubled communities throughout America, bringing to those communities new investments—and new hope. I would also like to commend the distinguished majority leader for ensuring that this legislation includes $2.5 billion for job training and other social services.

I am pleased to say that H.R. 11 includes a hunger committee proposal that would help the poor start their own businesses. This proposal—H.R. 3450, which I introduced with Representatives FRED GRANDY, MIKE ESPY, and BILL EMERSON—raises the asset limit from $1,000 to $10,000 for people on AFDC who want to climb out of poverty through their own microenterprise. For many people, the route out of poverty is through their own small business. If we are not going to subsidize microenterprise programs in the United States—as we do overseas through our aid budget—then the least we can do, Mr. Speaker, is allow self-employment for those who happen to be poor.

This legislation represents a significant step forward in developing microenterprise programs for the poor in America, and is the first step in my effort to help the poor build assets. Mr. Chairman, the $1,000 asset limit in AFDC is the major barrier to self-employment among the poor. It's foolish that for so long the Federal Government has trapped thousands of potential business owners in poverty. I'm pleased that this measure to develop businesses among the poor is before us today. I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the distinguished Republican whip, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH], who has worked so tirelessly to put together the final agreement that has permitted this legislation to come to the floor.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I hope not to take that much time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to strongly urge a "yes" vote, in particular for the job-creating enterprise zone parts of this bill. Just weeks after Boris Yeltsin, the President of Russia, spoke to us about freedom and hope, we have a bill that recognizes the importance of the free market, of incentives, of entrepreneurship. This bill is a first step toward an American perestroika. We recognize in this bill that free enterprise and business and entrepreneurship create jobs.

We are meeting the concern of Peter Ueberroth that Los Angeles have a chance to create real, permanent jobs in real, permanent businesses.

This effort to reestablish incentive and hope has been a long time coming. Secretary Jack Kemp, when he served in this body, introduced this idea over a decade ago. I talked to him a while ago, and he asked me to remind the House of the hard work of Bob Garcia, of Bill Gray, and of CHARLIE RANGEL who worked for many years in support of these concepts.

I especially want to recognize the extraordinary efforts over the last few days of the majority leader and the diligent effort by the White House staff and of BILL ARCHER and the Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee.

In the end, I also want to say that this is not just a victory for President Bush, who has for 4 years been urging the creation of enterprise zones. I believe this vote today is an opportunity to say across America to every poor person in every poor neighborhood that we are going to try to bring you incentives, we are going to try to bring you hope, we are going to try to ensure that every person in America who wants to create a job is encouraged by their Government to do the right thing, to help Americans who are today poor someday be Americans who have had a successful and a prosperous life. And I urge a "yes" vote.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT], the majority leader, who is really the principal architect of this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANCASTER). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT] is recognized for 2½ minutes.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I want to first say that DAN ROSTENKOWSKI, CHARLIE RANGEL, MAXINE WATERS, and JULIAN DIXON did an awful lot of work and an awful lot of people on this side of the aisle and that side of the aisle worked hard to put this bill together. We have not done many things together in this Congress. It is important today to do this bill, and I urge Members, whatever their misgivings are about this part or that part of the bill to try to vote for this bill, and I will tell them why.

This bill comes after the Los Angeles problem. Fifty people were killed in Los Angeles about 6 weeks ago, and that is why we are here today.

In 1991, the following numbers of people were killed, murdered in the following cities: Washington, DC, 489; St. Louis, MO, where I am from, 260; Wichita, KS, 28; Los Angeles, 1,039; New York City, 2,220; Baltimore, 305.

Ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, we have a problem in this country. This country is being torn apart in its urban areas because people do not have work and people do not have hope. This bill is not the millenium in urban policy. Do not misunderstand what this is. It is a first step, but we have to take that first step to give people hope.

People do not want to be on welfare, they want jobs. People do not want to be standing on street corners, they want to be in training. Mothers and fathers do not want their kids on drugs and being killed by drug people and drug dealers. They want them in school and they want to be healthy.

This bill is an amalgam of the best ideas that they have brought forward, and the best ideas that we have brought forward. Let us give these ideas a chance. It is an experiment that can work in 50 places in this country so that we do not have to read the death statistics like this year after year after year.

Vote for this legislation and give the people of this country some hope.

MODIFICATION OFFERED BY MR. ROSTENKOWSKI

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 11 be modified by striking section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, this measure has a number of extraordinarily positive features—such as enterprise zones—but I rise to object as strenuously to one ill-conceived provision: The reversal of longstanding tax policy implicit in the establishment of deductions for purchased goodwill. The effect of this change in accounting for goodwill is to provide greater incentives for conglomeration by realtors, in effect, another egregious taxpayer subsidy for corporate takeovers.

There is a tendency in modern American politics to exaggerate perspective by hyperbolic rhetoric. Hence, an interpreter of modern international relations recently underscored his view of the impact of the dissolution of the Soviet empire by entitling an essay: "The End of Civilization." At the risk of greater hyperbole, I consider the egregious goodwill tax break imposed by the majority party in an otherwise progressive bill to symbolize the end of liberalism.

American democracy is premised on free enterprise and the precept that citizens can be expected to have an economic as well as political stake in our society. The problem with this seemingly obscure tax deduction for purchased goodwill is that it gives incentives for conglomeration, for the narrowing rather than widening of ownership of America. It is a ripoff for investment bankers, a tax break for those least in need. By impelling takeovers of established businesses instead of entrepreneurial investment in new endeavors, it stifles the economy benefiting the apostles of greed rather than growth.

If this bill passes, as I assume it overwhelmingly will, I expect to work with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] to move expeditiously to seek a legislative reversal of this break of faith with the American liberal tradition.

What Congress should be doing is ending the tax deductibility of interest when applied to takeovers of large corporations rather than adding new incentives to conglomerates. It is the middle-class taxpayer, not the Wall Street investor, the producer of goods and services, not the manipulator of financial paper, that deserves a break. American priorities must be righted.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the urban aid package before us today.

The riots which devastated sections of Los Angeles—including parts of my district—demonstrated how quickly despair can erupt into rage in our inner cities. The L.A. riots provide the clearest possible reflection of our failure to address the roots of the absolute despair which consumers millions of Americans in our inner cities.

Today we attempt to turn the tide of neglect and restore hope and opportunity to the Nation's most depressed communities. This bill, H.R. 11, is a solid step in the right direction. H.R. 11 is pro-business, pro-inner city, pro-rural areas, and pro-jobs.

The enterprise zone concept represents a constructive approach to an extremely pressing problem. Enterprise zones will provide a critical incentive for private business to invest in and form lasting partnerships with communities which have been abandoned by business in the past.

H.R. 11 provides $2.5 billion to establish 50 urban and rural enterprise zones over the next 5 years. The bill will help to revitalize economically and physically distressed areas; create meaningful employment opportunities for zone residents; and encourage individuals to live in the areas in which they are employed.

The package before us also provides $2.5 billion for the President's Weed and Seed Program over the next 5 years. Weed and Seed money will fund intensive law enforcement and job training initiatives in designated enterprise zone areas.

I would like to insert into the RECORD a letter I received from Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley and Peter Ueberroth, chairman of the rebuild Los Angeles project, expressing their strong support for this legislation which will play a critical role in revitalizing areas of the city of Los Angeles crippled by joblessness and despair.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important measure.

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Los Angeles, CA, June 30, 1992.

Hon. JULIAN C. DIXON,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR JULIAN: We write to urge your swift and strong support for federal legislation to create Enterprise Zones in Los Angeles and other cities.

We are working with every available tool to Rebuild Los Angeles. We know we cannot rely on the massive infusion of government funds. We are relying instead on the outpouring of support from the private sector, which has been heartening, and the coming together of our communities as never before. But one tool is missing: The tax incentives that will encourage the private sector to invest where it has never invested before. Federal Enterprise Zones would provide some of these necessary incentives.

Put simply, our efforts to Rebuild Los Angeles will be dealt a serious blow if Congress and the President fail to agree soon on Enterprise Zone legislation. Because we are fast approaching the July 4th deadline for the enactment of an Enterprise Zone bill, your quick help is necessary. Please support our efforts to Rebuild Los Angeles by creating federal Enterprise Zones.

Thank you for your support.

TOM BRADLEY,
Mayor.
PETER V. UEBERROTH,
Rebuild Los Angeles.

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1991. Many beneficial provisions are included in this welcome legislation, however, I am nevertheless disappointed that it falls short of what it might have been.

Specifically, I refer to a provision to correct the Social Security notch disparity that several of my colleagues and I were unable to have included in H.R. 11.

As a Member of Congress from Florida, the Social Security notch issue is one of the top priorities of my senior citizen constituency. These notch babies believe they have been unfairly penalized by the Social Security notch decision because they were born in a certain year, something over which they have absolutely no control.

I have a high number of individuals in my congressional district who have been adversely affected by the notch; many have written to tell me that they have been unfairly penalized. They say it isn't fair that individuals with similar work histories, who were born before the notch years, receive a higher Social Security payment than they do. Mr. Speaker, I agree with my constituents—this is an unfair practice and it must be stopped.

As you know, the notch was created when Congress enacted a new Social Security benefit formula in 1977. The aim was to slow growth in future benefits, with little or no dollar loss during the transition to the new, permanent formula. However, the outcome was not what Congress had intended.

The outcome was that most retirees born during a certain period receive less than those born just a few years earlier. The end result was a substantial difference in benefit levels for people who had similar work histories but differed slightly in age.

Since I was elected in 1982, I have introduced legislation to rectify the unfair Social Security notch situation. I have also cosponsored H.R. 917, the notch consensus solution. Simply, we must do something to end an unfair benefit cut that affects 10 million retired workers and restore public confidence in the fairness of the Social Security system.

My constituents believe Congress is being unresponsive to their concerns. I have been told by some that Congress is just "waiting for notch babies to die off" or "Congress isn't really concerned about their plight or it would have acted long ago."

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to prove these comments wrong by passing a notch corrections amendment to this legislation. Unfortunately, objections by the leadership prevailed and I was prevented from doing so. I will continue to work with my like-minded colleagues in the future to pass this legislation of such critical importance to our Nation's seniors.

That said, I do not feel I can fairly oppose this bill on these grounds. To do so would call for sacrificing a full repeal of the 10-percent luxury tax on boats, furs, jewelry, and airplanes, a tax that has cause massive job loss in the industries involved.

It would mean turning my back on enterprise zone provisions that I have long sought as a means of revitalizing our inner cities—not through a huge redistribution of taxpayer dollars, but by enticing businesses to move into and set up operations in such enterprise zones within our cities.

It would mean rejecting the extension of a variety of tax credit extensions important to business and consumers. It would also mean rejecting important passive loss reforms that will rebuild our real estate industry and jumpstart our economy.

No, Mr. Speaker, this legislation is too important to reject, but—again—it is shameful that a Social Security notch correction could not have been added, thus making H.R. 11 so much more than it currently is.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of passage of H.R. 11, the bill which will make a much-needed long-term investment in both rural and urban areas across the country.

H.R. 11 is a prompt, responsible response to the poverty, unemployment and hopelessness that grip so many areas of our Nation. It provides an effective method of addressing the obvious problems that have been plaguing our communities for years, but that have only been highlighted in recent months. H.R. 11 will make it easier for American families—both rural and urban—to succeed and prosper.

H.R. 11 creates 25 rural development investment zones and 25 urban enterprise zones in distressed areas across the country over a 3-year period. All zones will be selected competitively from those areas with unemployment rates 1.5 times the national average, poverty rates of at least 20 percent in 90 percent of the area, and a plan to assist employers and employees in the zone—such as reduced taxes and increased delivery of local public services. Rural zones must also have a decline in employment of more than 5 percent during the 5 years prior to the zone's designation and a 10-percent decline in population from 1980 to 1990.

This concept provides incentives—in the way of tax credits—to businesses in an effort to attract them to relocate and invest in targeted areas. The end result is improved economic development for the involved community and its people.

Then, to stimulate growth within the targeted zone community itself, H.R. 11 funds job training, education, health and nutrition, housing and community development, and crime prevention. It supports solutions proven to be successful—like Head Start, health centers, and drug treatment and housing assistance programs. This includes job training and education for welfare recipients to get them off welfare and working. It will permit communities to attack crime, address their health and welfare needs and invest in their own development. It fosters activities which have shown over time to have the greatest benefit across the country.

In addition to providing tax breaks for businesses that invest in enterprise zones, H.R. 11 includes tax provisions designed to stimulate overall economic growth throughout the Nation. For example, H.R. 11 repeals the luxury tax on boats, furs, and jewelry—a tax that had an adverse impact on employment in the affected industries. By repealing this tax, H.R. 11 will alleviate the job loss and economic strain placed on those industries affected by this tax. H.R. 11 also extends certain tax provisions that expired at the end of last month—including mortgage revenue bonds, low income housing tax credits, and the exclusion for employer-provided educational assistance.

H.R. 11 contains a provision that will protect taxpayer rights. The Taxpayers' Bill of Rights will establish a taxpayers' advocate, prohibit the Treasury Department from issuing regulations that apply retroactively, and make IRS agents personally responsible for acting capriciously or negligently. It also simplifies the treatment of pensions, mutual funds, and tax exempt bonds.

And last, but not least, the bill pays for itself. It includes provisions designed to generate revenue, including raising taxes on securities firms' inventories, limiting tax benefits to new owners of failed thrifts, and making permanent increases in the estimated tax installments for upper-income taxpayers and for corporations filing quarterly.

We must again begin to place domestic issues at the top of our agenda. The investment that H.R. 11 makes in our communities is a good place to start. We have to see that all our children have safe schools and safe neighborhoods. We must ensure that everyone who can work, does. We must see that every member of society has access to equal opportunity and fair treatment. These are great challenges that we began to address in the 1960's and must continue to meet today.

H.R. 11 will promote development in our communities, support businesses who participate in this effort, help to jump-start our economy, and generate revenue to pay for itself. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to support passage of this important piece of legislation.

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I rise in opposition to this legislation. I support many of the provisions of this bill and have cosponsored several bills that have been incorporated in this legislation. However, I cannot support legislation that will continue the practice of using smoke and mirrors and accounting tricks to circumvent the Budget Enforcement Act.

Although I will vote against this bill today, I continue to support several of the provisions included in this bill and hope that we can enact these proposals in a tax package that is honestly paid for. The changes in passive loss rules and the changes in the depreciation schedule for the purposes of the alternative minimum tax would have a positive effect on our economy. I was also pleased that this bill includes a 6-month extension of the 25-percent deduction for self-employed health insurance. I hope that this credit can be increased to 100 percent and extended permanently as part of a health care package. The extension of the TJTC and the tax credit to offset the cost to employers for FICA taxes on tips are also important to restaurant owners in my district.

Despite this, I must oppose this bill because of my concerns about the budgetary impact of this bill. Although the tax and entitlement provisions are deficit neutral over the 5-year budget window, they will lose nearly $5 billion over the next 4-years. I fear that by the time this bill actually raises revenue we will have spent the revenues several times over. In addition, I am deeply concerned about the precedent being set by redesignating $500 million of domestic spending as international spending in order to allow us to increase domestic appropriations without corresponding spending cuts. I believe that if we want to increase spending in one area, we should make corresponding spending cuts, not changes in accounting. We cannot continue the practice of using accounting tricks to circumvent the budget rules or waive these rules altogether when they become inconvenient.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we can defeat this bill today so that the budget tricks can be removed and we can pass a tax bill that lives within our budgetary restraints.

Mr. OLVER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the provisions of H.R. 11 which will help our businesses, our workers, and our communities.

In particular, I am very pleased that we are extending, in some cases permanently, the expiring tax provisions. I would have preferred that the tax credit for research and development have been made permanent, but I strongly support its extension for 18 months. We must increase investment in R&D, and this tax credit is one vital element toward helping our companies invest in the new technologies which will be the foundation of our future economy.

Similarly, I have always been a strong supporter of the tax credit for employer-provided educational assistance. We should do everything we can to help our workers get the skills they increasingly need to produce the finest products in the world. Likewise, making the targeted jobs tax credit will help both our workers and businesses.

I also believe that making permanent the credits for low-income housing, mortgage revenue bonds and small issue manufacturing bonds will help us address these desperate needs in Massachusetts.

I would also like to express my support for releasing previously appropriated, but unobligated, funds for the JOBS program. JOBS provides training and education to help recipients of Aid to Families with Dependent Children get off AFDC and into jobs.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a perfect bill, but I believe that it will do a good deal to help our businesses and our communities, and I hope that we can use this legislation as a starting point. We must get to work to resolve the many problems which are afflicting this country.

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11. This is a strong job creation and economic growth package which should encourage investment in urban and rural areas. It includes a number of important provisions to help stimulate economic recovery, put people back to work, and boost small business development.

H.R. 11 includes the text of H.R. 3450, a microenterprise bill to enable welfare recipients to start small businesses. Microenterprise programs are an innovative way to help the poor work their way out of poverty by helping them set up and develop their own business enterprises.

Given the turmoil in many American communities, we need to look for ways to help the poor help themselves. The microenterprise program will do just that. By helping the poor start their own small businesses, they gain financial independence and security and lose their reliance on public assistance. The taxpayer will save in the long term and the community will gain.

H.R. 11 would create 50 enterprise zones in economically distressed communities, providing special tax breaks and other Federal aid to attract businesses and revitalize the areas. The purpose of enterprise zones is to encourage investment in areas which have been neglected.

Half of the 50 enterprise zones would be located in cities. The other half would be in rural communities. The same tax benefits would be available to investors in both urban and rural zones. This program is designed to encourage small businesses to locate or expand in distressed communities and strengthen the economic base in these areas.

H.R. 11 contains elements of the Weed and Seed initiative which provide a framework for coordinated action by the public, private, and nonprofit sectors to revitalize inner cities and promote self-sufficiency. Weed and Seed would allow both rural and urban enterprise zones to select applicable programs for their areas from a series of five categories: Crime and community policing, job training, education, health and nutrition, and housing and community development. Weed and Seed will give communities help so they can best decide how to meet their needs.

The bill includes other tax provisions which are sound building blocks for the economy.

H.R. 11 allow real estate professionals, including agents, to deduct losses on rental property—so-called passive losses—against other income from real estate investments; extends permanently the low-income housing tax credit, extends permanently the targeted jobs tax credit, which benefits businesses that hire certain disadvantaged workers; and extends permanently the mortgage revenue bond and mortgage credit certificate programs, which allow State and local governments to use tax-exempt financing for low-income housing.

The bill also extends for 18 months several expiring tax breaks; including the research and development tax credit, employer-provided educational assistance, a tax exception for gifts of appreciated property and employer-provided legal services. The bill also extends the 25-percent deduction for health insurance costs of the self-employed for 6 months.

H.R. 11 repeals the luxury tax. While the 1990 budget agreement included excise taxes on luxury items for deficit reduction purposes, it is now clear that the luxury tax will not generate additional revenue; but actually result in a net loss to the economy. Repeal of the luxury tax is particularly important to the boating industry in Tennessee. The manufacture and sale of boats plays an important role in our local economy. Because of the luxury tax, the industry has suffered. Repeal of the luxury tax should go a long way toward helping the industry get back on its feet.

H.R. 11 also contains significant welfare reform provisions to make it easier for States to fund the welfare-to-work programs I supported as part of the last major welfare overhaul, the 1988 Family Support Act, Public Law 100–485.

Under that law, States were required to set up education training and work programs called JOBS [Job Opportunities and Basic Skills] aimed at helping welfare recipients leave the public rolls. This provides welfare recipients with a sense of responsibility as well as the opportunity to gain valuable work skills, job histories and job references. H.R. 11 increases the Federal match for the JOBS Program and includes a modified version of the administration's welfare reform proposal to increase the asset test for recipient families.

H.R. 11 includes the Taxpayer Bill of Rights Act. This is a well-balanced package of reforms I have long supported that should provide taxpayers with additional protections and safeguards in their dealings with the Internal Revenue Service [IRS].

Congress made a good start in 1988 when the original Taxpayer Bill of Rights was enacted into law. But it is evident that more needs to be done because of problems taxpayers continue to have under the current Federal tax system. I hope these reform provisions will move us closer to the objective of developing a level playing field between taxpayers and the IRS.

I urge passage of H.R. 11.

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the enterprise zone legislation that we have before us today. The riots in Los Angeles brought long overdue attention to the conditions in our inner cities in this country. They have been seriously neglected with terrible consequences. But, while we focus on the problems of the largest cities, we should not lose sight of the equally desperate situation in many of our smaller cities. As we consider enterprise zone legislation, I urge my colleagues to consider the desperate problems faced by many of our small cities.

For the first time since the Great Depression, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts declared one of its cities in receivership in 1990. Chelsea, MA has only 28,000 residents but it faces all of the same difficulties of our largest cities.

Chelsea's tax base has declined while the demand on its public services has soared with unemployment and increased poverty. It has one of the highest percentages of public housing of any city in the Nation. Chelsea is also one of the most racially diverse cities of Massachusetts.

Because of its size and economic distress, nearly all of Chelsea's citizens live in areas which would qualify for enterprise zone treatment. It would be ironic if we adopted legislation which allows enterprise zones for large cities—with their broad resource base—but excludes smaller ones like Chelsea in which almost the entire city is in economic distress.

Since being placed in receivership 2 years ago with a $10 million deficit in a $40 million budget, Chelsea has made dramatic progress. This month receiver Jim Carlin has been able to propose a balanced budget for the coming fiscal year. But cities like Chelsea need long-term reinvestment by the private sector to create jobs and rebuild an aging infrastructure. The enterprise proposal being considered by the House today provides incentives to bring jobs back into these areas and enables people to improve their own lives and that of their community.

I am pleased that the legislation before us today will enable small cities like Chelsea to qualify as enterprise zones on their own or in partnership with other cities, and I urge my colleagues to support this bill.

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 11, and to say that I am relieved that the President was finally willing to work with Congress to craft a workable first step in rebuilding American cities. I thank our Democratic leadership, Mr. FOLEY and Mr. GEPHARDT in particular, for bringing this bill to the floor expeditiously.

I am particularly pleased that my legislation on child support collections and reporting has been included in the package, and thank my colleague from Texas, Mr. ANDREWS, for his leadership on this issue. The provision, which will require credit reporting agencies to publish unpaid child support debts on consumer credit reports is a simple but highly effective method of increasing child support payment rates. The Association for Children for the Enforcement of Support estimates that collection rates in States who use this tool have seen collection rates soar by 20 percent.

The time has come to get tough on the deadbeat dads who skip out on their responsibilities to their families. This provision will make a meaningful contribution to easing the poverty and suffering for many poor women and children in this country. I applaud the conferees for including it in H.R. 11. I urge my colleagues to support this much-needed bill.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 11. Before I get into my problems with the substance of the measure, let me say that I vigorously oppose the manner under which the bill is being brought up.

By considering H.R. 11 under suspension of the rules, we will not have an opportunity to deal with the Federal Express issue—a union buster which will lead to discrimination in the allocation of pension benefits by pilots' employers. And in this forum, we are also denied an opportunity to address the writeoff of intangible assets—a blatant taxpayer subsidy for corporate raiders.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when we should be moving forward to help the poor and unemployed throughout the Nation, this bill, at best, will help just a chosen few in a handful of cities.

The focus of this enterprise zone legislation is all wrong. What was intended to reach poor and unemployed people in this Nation's cities has been converted to yet another bundle of tax cuts for enterprising fat cats. This bill creates tax breaks we cannot afford for people who need them the least.

This enterprise zone legislation is nothing more than a continuation of the Reaganomics of the 1980's—shoveling tax breaks onto the wealthy in hopes of seeing the benefits trickle down onto the real people in need. Enterprise zones will not create jobs. They will simply shift jobs from one depressed area to another. The proposed zones will not solve the problems of urban blight nor the desperate need for employment in inner cities. It is just the wrong way to go.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that there are some very valuable elements which have been included in this package: Repealing the excise tax on boats, extending employer-provided educational assistance, extending the self-employed health deduction, making permanent the targeted jobs tax credit and the low-income housing tax credit, and making permanent the authority of States and localities to issue mortgage revenue bonds. But these good elements are far outweighed by the special interest tax breaks in the bill.

The lion's share of relief in this bill is in the form of tax benefits to individuals and businesses—bonuses for those who can afford to get their high-paid lobbyists to Capitol Hill.

At a time when this Nation's cities are hemorrhaging, when unemployment continues to rise, and when the American people are hurting, this tax giveaway and Band-Aid approach to relief is tragic. I urge my colleagues to join me in opposing H.R. 11.

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. Today's passage of H.R. 11 marks a nearly final chapter in a long and tragic story that has decimated our economy and threatened the livelihood of thousands of families throughout the Nation.

This bill repeals the luxury tax on boats and jewelry, which were included in the so-called deficit reduction bill passed in 1990. As we all know, this bill badly failed to meet its objectives as we have seen a doubling of the deficit since the bill's passage.

Mr. Speaker, on January 1, 1991, the jewelry and boating luxury taxes took effect. Since that fateful day, we have witnessed thousands upon thousands of workers being thrown out into the street without a job from what were once two of this Nation's—and indeed my State of Rhode Island's—most proud and productive industries.

Instead of penalizing the wealthy and raising revenue as we were promised, these luxury taxes only served to damage the livelihood of uniquely skilled boating and jewelry craftsmen who have contributed so much to our economy and to our heritage. The wealthy, on the other hand, simply found other ways of spending their money, such as purchasing boats and jewelry abroad.

In fact, a total of 2,000 out of Rhode Island's 4,000 boatbuilding employees lost their jobs due to the luxury boat tax. These jobs averaged about $12 per hour. Additionally, this tax forced the closure of Pearson Yachts, a nationally known boatbuilder in my hometown of Portsmouth, RI.

Those of us who have worked long and hard to pass legislation to repeal these taxes know that 18-plus months of damage will be difficult to repair. A stand-alone repeal bill should have been on this floor long, long ago.

I commend all of my colleagues, Republican and Democrat, who I have worked with to restore viability of our jewelry and boating industries. Next time, let's hope that Congress thinks first before enacting such damaging legislation as the luxury taxes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation and want to note in particular the fact that this bill would permanently extend the small issue Industrial Development Bonds Program.

I introduced legislation to extend the IDB Program at the beginning of this Congress which has been cosponsored by over 230 Members of the House. Members of the House know that industrial development bonds and small issue Aggie bonds create jobs in their own district and in areas large and small across the United States.

The Industrial Development Bond Program is the only Federal program promoting the growth and expansion of small manufacturers available to State and local governments. The result has been to enhance the international competitive position of U.S. manufacturing and to preserve American jobs that might have been lost to foreign manufacturing facilities.

IDB's play a critical role in providing the good paying manufacturing jobs that allow U.S. workers to support their families and pay taxes. Between 1987 and 1990, IDB's annually have created an estimated 59,000 new manufacturing jobs and facilitated the retention of 73,000 jobs through the financing of roughly 1,100 projects (based on a 1989 volume of $3.227 billion).

Industrial development bonds are used throughout the United States to achieve the goals set by this committee. Only the mortgage revenue bond program represents a larger proportion of State and local bond activity. At a time when total manufacturing employment has declined over the past decade, the number of workers in smaller plants (those with fewer than 250 employees) has actually grown by over 500,000.

Since 1986, the Ways and Means Committee has regularly voted to extend temporarily the qualified small issue IDB Program. Unfortunately, the threat of periodic sunsets has limited the ability of State and local governments to utilize this program in the most effective manner. Still, small issue IDB's continue to play a central role in the economic development strategies of most U.S. State and local governments even with this limitation.

The important national economic role played by IDB's is one reason why the House has historically given its strong support to extension of the Industrial Development Bond Program. Industrial development bonds have kept open firms that might have closed or gone overseas, and have created in my own State of Pennsylvania over 7,800 new manufacturing jobs and preserved another 15,725 jobs that would have been lost between 1987 and 1990.

Passage of the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee will finally provide a permanent extension of the small issue IDB Program. Support for this bill will remove the uncertainty over sunsets and permit small firms in every congressional district to expand and retain good-paying jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support the bill and support permanent extension of small issue industrial development bonds.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous support to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation with a great deal of reservation. I appreciate the effort of the majority leader to do the best he could against an administration more intent on lining the pockets of the rich than in lending a helping hand to the poor.

We started this process in response to a rebellion in Los Angeles. We've ended it with a windfall for corporate America and a whimper from the Congress. It's very painful for me to vote "yes" for legislation that provides $2 in tax breaks for the rich for every $1 it spends on the people most in need.

It's a sad day for this body when in order to get $500 million more in spending a year for our cities we have to repeal the luxury tax, modify the passive loss provision which will promote a new round of real estate speculation, and allow corporate tax writeoffs for so-called good will. Good will for business will create bad will with workers and lead to a new wave of corporate mergers.

Mr. Speaker, you can't get blood from a turnip. I know what is possible with this President. Therefore, notwithstanding these odious provisions, I will vote for the measure.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, the 1990 budget agreement was harmful to the economy in many ways, but perhaps the most noticeable provision is the luxury tax that was intended to soak the rich.

This excise tax zeroed in on five industries and targeted them for destruction with the precision of a smart bomb. The American workers who build, sell, and service expensive cars, boats, planes, furs, and jewelry never had a chance.

Several of our colleagues deserve special praise for getting into the battle early and fighting consistently to repeal these job-killing taxes.

Early last year OLYMPIA SNOWE opposed a bill to repeal the tax on boats, and also joined with Senator CONNIE MACK to produce a Joint Economic Committee minority report on the negative effects of these painful taxes.

DICK NICHOLS of Kansas sponsored a bill to repeal all five of these taxes, and also worked diligently with Representative BILLY TAUZIN and myself to put together a bipartisan coalition to totally eliminate the luxury taxes.

And of course CLAY SHAW of Florida who fought long and hard on the Ways and Means Committee to repeal the luxury taxes.

It is time to repeal these taxes and allow the American workers in these industries go back to work building boats and planes and selling cars, furs, and jewelry.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. Due to the restrictive nature of today's floor debate, critical amendments were prohibited from being offered and, therefore, I must oppose this legislation.

One instance in particular: I had planned to offer an amendment to strike the provision in H.R. 11 which removes the collective bargaining condition from the airline pilot pension plan exemption regarding the nondiscrimination rules of ERISA.

This provision clearly assists one individual company's attempt to undermine the union organizing efforts of its pilots and the full House should have the opportunity to remove it from this legislation.

Under current law, airline pilot pension plans are exempt from the nondiscrimination rules of ERISA if, and only, the plans are negotiated in bona fide collective bargaining.

The inclusion of a provision to remove the collective bargaining condition, thus broadening the exemption to include all airline pilots regardless of whether or not they are organized, violates the principle that Congress should not intervene on behalf of one particular side in a labor-management dispute or a legitimate organizing effort.

Mr. Speaker, nonunionized workers have no comparable process to ensure that they receive fair treatment. For this very reason, a variety of laws, including the Internal Revenue Code, contain minimum standards to ensure fair treatment of workers.

Currently, the Internal Revenue Code requires noncollectively bargained pension plans, including nonunion airline pilot plans, to meet certain nondiscrimination rules to prevent discrimination against workers who are not highly compensated. This type of protection is crucial.

Furthering this argument is the fact that only one airline, Federal Express, is actively pursuing this type of exemption for its pilots. It is clear that their motive is not wholly selfless, but rather a demonstration to their company pilots that there is nothing to be gained from organizing a union to improve their pension plan because the Congress will change the law.

And Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear: This is not a quarrel with the Federal Express Co. I personally have great admiration for the company's success. In fact, I was the author of the provision which lifted the 7,500 pound weight limitation on air freight; action which effectively allowed the Federal Express Co. to compete in a deregulated environment.

Mr. Speaker, the provision in H.R. 11 is the very same provision which engendered significant controversy as part of the previously vetoed bill, H.R. 4210.

You may recall that a letter signed by 44 of our Democratic colleagues expressed such strong opposition to this provision that we were willing to vote against the conference report on H.R. 4210.

It was only after receiving assurances from Members of the House Democratic leadership that they would oppose this type of provision in future Democratic-authored tax measures that I relented and voted for the bill while urging my colleagues to do the same. These assurances make the current restricted framework all the more frustrating.

Mr. Speaker, there are provisions in this bill that I support which I believe would help to rebuild our economy, provide jobs, and help to reinvigorate the U.S. industrial and education infrastructures.

I want the record to show that I support the provisions in the bill that make permanent four of the expiring tax provisions including the low-income housing tax credit, the targeted jobs tax credit, mortgage revenue bonds, and small issue development bonds.

I aslo support the extension of the expiring tax credits such as the R&D tax credit and the section 127 exclusion for employer-provided education benefits.

Finally, I support the repeal of the luxury tax on boats, airplanes, jewelry, and furs, with indexation of the threshold for automobiles. This tax was misguided and has caused unacceptable job loss across the Nation.

It is my hope that the misguided provision in this bill that provides for the amortization of intangible assets over a period of 14 years will be fixed during the conference on this bill. This provision will act as a 20-percent sales tax on high-technology investments and will undermine the efforts of high technology companies to commercialize new technology, which is vital in this competitive information age.

Mr. Speaker, we must resist every attempt to use the Congress as a tool to thwart the legitimate efforts of employees to organize and thus, I must oppose this legislation.

Mr. SERRANO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 11, legislation that will implement substantive urban aid programs to assist our Nation's beleaguered cities.

The violence that overtook south central Los Angeles last May was only the most dramatic indicator of the despair that has accumulated in our Nation's cities after more than a decade of neglect from Washington. Those of us who live amid the poverty, poor health, unemployment, crime, and drug abuse that is so prevalent in parts of all of our great cities know from daily experience how badly our Nation's wounds have festered.

Mr. Speaker, at long last we have before us in H.R. 11 legislation to comprehensively address the myriad problems that have contributed to a cycle of decline in our cities.

The centerpiece of this legislation is the extension of an array of important tax benefits to businesses that locate in and employ the residents of 25 areas designated as urban enterprise zones. By giving employers valuable incentives to invest in distressed areas, this legislation will help set the designated zones on a path toward revitalization and renewal.

Some have said that this legislation is inadequate because it designates only 25 urban enterprises zones, while many dozens of urban areas are in equally dire need of this assistance. I agree with this criticism. My colleagues are correct; this in itself is not enough—but it is a very important first step.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that as the benefits and ultimate cost-effectiveness of enterprise zones become apparent, we will be ready, willing, and able to replicate this program to other distressed urban areas within a short period of time.

I fully support this important legislation.

Mr. RAMSTAD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992.

Mr. Speaker, the unemployment figures released this morning should be of grave concern to all of us. For too long, Congress has delayed passage of a progrowth tax package which would help stimulate the economy and create new jobs for those Americans who need them.

I am pleased to see that Congress has decided to put aside politics as usual to produce legislation that will help the American people, especially those in our depressed urban centers.

By creating targeted enterprise zones, this measure will provide needed jobs for many of our urban areas. Its partial tax break on capital gains should give businesses incentives to invest in our inner cities and employ many of the poor who want to get off the welfare rolls and into the labor force.

While I would rather see the complete elimination of taxes on capital gains in these areas, I believe that this bill represents a good start in the right direction.

In addition, I am delighted to see Congress provide funding for the President's Weed and Seed Program.

This program, which coordinates law enforcement, community policing, and social services efforts at the Federal, State, and local levels, has been tremendously successful in pilot programs across the country and promises to be a very effective tool in cleaning up and revitalizing the hardest hit neighborhoods in the country.

This bill also includes a number of important tax provisions that will move us toward an economic recovery more quickly.

For example, by reinstating the passive loss deduction for real estate professionals, this bill will restore the attractiveness of real estate investment, boost currently low market prices, increase construction jobs, and make low-income housing more available.

In addition, H.R. 11 repeals the luxury tax adopted in 1990, which has virtually destroyed a number of industries, throwing thousands of people out of work and losing millions of dollars in tax revenue from those now-unemployed workers. I strongly applaud the repeal of luxury taxes in this bill.

I am also pleased to see that this bill includes the so-called tax extenders which are critical to economic recovery. The targeted jobs tax credit helps millions of disadvantaged workers—especially people with disabilities—obtain employment. Mortgage revenue and industrial development bonds encourage much-needed, long-term, productive investment. These and the other nine tax extender measures are urgently needed to increase productivity, investment, and jobs.

As many of my colleagues have said before me, the bill has a number of provisions that must be corrected before this legislation is enacted, and I trust these will be addressed in conference. But the overall bill will be of great benefit to the economy and I urge its immediate passage.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. This bill repeals the ill-conceived luxury tax on boats and other products, extends some of our most important economic growth incentive programs, relaxes the current real estate passive loss restrictions, and several other provisions that will help to rejuvenate our economy.

The luxury tax on boats has been a disaster from day one. I have seen companies whose top quality products and reputations made them successful for decades brought to their knees by the imposition of this tax in the middle of a recession. This tax lost money because workers who could have been earning money and paying taxes lost their jobs and collected unemployment.

Housing and real estate have led our economy out of past recessions, and H.R. 11 provides some tools to help those sectors do it again. First, it relaxes the real estate passive loss restrictions imposed by the Tax Reform Act of 1986. These restrictions were too harsh and were not phased in slowly enough to allow the industry to adjust. The bill also permanently extends the low-income housing tax credit and the tax exemption for mortgage revenue bonds, two proven real estate incentives.

The bill will also help create jobs in other areas. The expiring targeted jobs tax credit and the exemption for small issue industrial development bonds will be permanently extended, and the alternative minimum tax [AMT] depreciation schedule is accelerated to lower the costs of capital for businesses.

Finally, this bill also includes enterprise zone incentives for 50 of our poorest rural and urban areas. These incentives include wage credits, a capital gains reduction for long-term investment, increased initial depreciation allowances, deductions for investing in enterprise zone businesses, and other incentives. While we have to be careful that these incentives actually create new jobs and do not merely shift employment from one area to another, I believe that the zones are an approach worth trying.

There are some provisions in the bill that are of questionable value and I would not support them on a separate vote. But, on balance, it is a good bill and worthy of our support.

Mr. HOAGLAND. Mr. Speaker, as we debate today H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, I want to thank the leadership of the House and the President for putting together a bill that will address some inner cities and distressed rural areas.

Enterprise zones can help areas like South Omaha and North Omaha in my district. Many Omaha citizens need improved schools that will stimulate the interest of their youngsters to stick with it, to complete their high school education, and to have the skills to go into the work force. They need good jobs and to know that the jobs are out there, new housing and a sense of community. They need hope for the future.

Without a sense of opportunity, people begin to lose hope. When people lose hope, they lose confidence in themselves. They see no prospects of working their way up, and they stop trying. Investors lose confidence when communities decay. They decide to put the new grocery store, bank, or manufacturing plant in another part of town rather than take a risk.

Where there is little hope, little work, poor education and poor health care, some people turn to drugs. In spite of the best efforts of many community leaders, some Omahans have become victims of the drug epidemic; others have become guilty of spreading the drugs and violence. I know the people in Omaha want to fight back against this epidemic—more than 300 people came to a town hall meeting last year to show their concern about the crime and drug problem. Groups like MAD DADS are trying to fight the drug problem by acting as positive role models for at-risk youth. But the war on drugs will always be an uphill fight until we can break the cycle of unemployment, underemployment, and hopelessness which ravages these communities.

It's time we made a serious effort to help break the cycles of poverty and depression that plague distressed areas. This bill is a step in that direction. The bill before us today would authorize HUD to select 25 cities as urban enterprise zones and authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to select 25 regions as rural enterprise zones. In addition, the enterprise community block grants in the bill are intended to attack a range of problems, from health and nutrition deficiencies, lack of job training and educational opportunities, poor housing, and crime. The tax provisions, especially the wage credit, can help create jobs for residents of the designated zones.

Let me give a concrete example of how these programs can work in my district. There are several vacant and abandoned buildings in South Omaha and in North Omaha. Investors are reluctant to develop the areas because they seem risky. The current treatment of passive losses discourages such development efforts. This bill would create additional incentives to develop a distressed area, by changing passive loss treatment. Businesses would be encouraged to invest in the zone through investment incentives such as increased expensing and capital gains tax reduction. Residents can be better able to take advantage of these opportunities with the help of job training programs. The wage credit encourages hiring residents of the zone. The grants would help attack the crime problem, improving the quality of life for the residents as well as providing a more secure investment climate. All of these working together can offer the hope of a better future.

I urge Members to support this bill. We have a chance to make a difference. Let's take a real step toward providing hope to our cities.

Mr. KOLTER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 11 due to a provision that would amend the Federal Tax Code concerning pension plans for commercial pilots. This provision, Mr. Speaker, is a perfect example of how a controversial and meritless idea motivated by a particular interest finds its way into an otherwise sound piece of legislation.

This provision would alter the tax code to give nonunion pilots the same treatment as union pilots under the Tax Code pension rules. In a nutshell, this attempt to change the Federal Tax Code is an effort to undermine organized labor. As things stand now, union commercial pilots are exempt from discrimination testing in the existing code for a very good reason; they can generally take care of themselves and have collective bargaining power. Therefore, the same rules don't need to apply.

Backers of this change claim that nonunion employees are discriminated against. This argument misses the point. If nonunion pilots are lumped in with union pilots, both highly paid employees, the discrimination is against the mechanics, clerks, drivers, and all other lower paid employees. This attempted alteration would fundamentally change the intent of the present exclusion.

Let's be honest. This is no more than an attempt by certain aircraft operators to erode the influence of its airline unions. If we were to change the Federal Tax Code every time an organized group; whether it be bankers, lawyers, environmentalists, or whomever, wanted to gain leverage against a competitive interest, Congress would be amending it every month. Considered alone, this provision would not survive on its own merits.

H.R. 11, Mr. Speaker, is supposed to be about economic growth: stimulating construction, manufacturing, urban investment, job creation, and education. This provision does nothing to spur economic growth. In fact, it is special interest provisions like this that do nothing but lengthen the odds that needed legislation will be enacted.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support for this urban aid package and the assistance it will bring to cities like my own Philadelphia.

I support this bill because it begins, again, to focus Federal attention on America's cities.

I support the enterprise zone concept because it will bring jobs and opportunity and hope to desperate city neighborhoods across America.

I support the Enterprise Community Block Grant Program because it will help enterprise neighborhoods with better health programs, crime-fighting assistance, and better housing.

I support many of the tax programs—like the low-income housing tax credit and mortgage revenue bonds—because it will mean more and better housing in urban America.

I support the job assistance dollars available for young adults because these are the men and women who are having the most trouble finding good jobs in our cities.

I support the targeted jobs tax credit because it means that businesspeople will again begin hiring poor young men and women.

I supported and worked hard for the match waiver provision because it will turn the $15 billion vision of last year's highway bill into new highways, improved mass transit systems, and most importantly, good jobs in our cities. I am disappointed that it was negotiated away.

This is a good bill, however.

But we must not consider this to be the end to our flirtation with the American city. This is just the beginning.

I know I speak for the urban caucus, which I chair, and its 78 members in telling my colleagues, the White House, and America, that we are not going to let you forget the people of our cities by passing this legislation. You are not going to put cities back in a file drawer of dead issues.

We have much more work to do.

We must continue our fight for good jobs, opportunity, and promise for the people who live in our cities.

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of this aid package. Like all compromises, it includes some things I want and some things that I don't want, and leaves out some things that I wanted very much.

In addition to urban and rural enterprise zones, it extends the low-income housing tax credit, targeted jobs tax credits, and other important extenders. That's all good.

But my primary concern is that whatever package we produce must pass the asset test. We can debate capital gains tax breaks, and other tax benefits, for investors, but we need to focus on policies which help people in distressed areas who don't have any capital, any assets, to begin with.

That's why I wanted an opportunity to amend this bill and promote the development of employee stock ownership plans within urban and rural enterprise zones. I wanted to allow workers in enterprise zones to also become owners. But I can't under suspension of the rules.

By leaving out ESOP's, this bill fails the asset test. But when it comes to welfare reform, it passes.

It passes the asset test by allowing States to raise the $1,000 asset limit for welfare recipients up to $10,000 if money is being saved for education, to start a microenterprise, or to purchase a home.

It requires States to exempt the first $10,000 of net worth of a microenterprise from the asset test.

Lastly, this bill exempts any earnings of a child who is a student from the resource test, so a child could work and save for college without it counting against the families income.

In this bill of $2.5 billion in enterprise zone tax benefits, raising the asset limit to $10,000 for welfare recipients might sound insignificant. But it is very significant for families on welfare, who need savings, and assets, to move off welfare.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. MCMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992. This is a good bill, and contains some changes in the Tax Code which are long overdue.

Of particular importance is the repeal of the luxury excise tax on boats, effective January 1, 1992. There are times when we have to recognize when we have made a mistake, and work to remedy it. This is one of those times.

While the tax was ostensibly aimed at hitting the wealthy, it sunk the boating industry. The boating industry, with national sales down by over 40 percent in the last year and a half, is in a state of depression. Already reeling from a national recession, the luxury tax was the straw which broke the camel's back. This repeal is crucial in getting the industry back on track.

I am also pleased that this bill will permanently extend the tax preference for small-issue industrial development bonds, the targeted jobs tax credit, the low-income housing tax credit, the mortgage revenue bond tax exemption and other such measures.

These tax provisions are fundamentals which strengthen our economy, and encourage the needed investments for our future. They are cost-effective, and have proven themselves in practice.

Continuing the tax exemption for industrial development bonds (IDB) is a particularly important measure. IDB's are an effective economic development tool, which leverage private and public capital for local development. At a time when Congress is looking for new incentives to spur economic growth, we must not lose sight of an existing tool for creating and preserving jobs.

Similarly, the mortgage revenue bond program has been crucial in helping single families buy their own homes. Aside from bolstering the construction industry, this provision—along with the low-income housing tax credit which will also be extended—provides a useful social function in facilitating home ownership.

In an era of limited Federal resources, it is these types of incentives which will prove to be essential to our future. They help State and local governments create jobs, provide housing, and take care of local needs—all in a cost-effective manner. One of the successes of America's local government has been its access to capital markets, which have allowed local governments to meet the needs of the local community. This measure maintains that access.

The bill also includes provisions designed to protect the rights of taxpayers—including the establishing of a taxpayers' advocate, prohibiting the Treasury Department from issuing regulations that apply retroactively, and making IRS agents personally liable if they are found to have acted capriciously or negligently.

I am also supportive of the the adopted changes in the passive loss provisions which allow real estate developers and brokers to use losses from rental real estate to offset other income. Under current law, taxpayers cannot use losses from rental real estate to offset any other types of income. Thus, a real estate professional cannot offset legitimate rental losses from other income. This means that real estate managers are paying taxes on gross income and not net income.

Anytime government policy disrupts the balance of the market, there will be a price to pay. The policies of the early 1980's skewed economic decisionmaking. I have long been concerned, however, that Federal policy reacted too strongly to this situation. The repeal of the passive loss provisions in 1986 went too far and ended up skewing economic decisionmaking in a different direction.

This clearly has a negative impact—and not just on the real estate industry; it's also hurting our financial industries. Consequently, we will not see a significant economic rebound until we see real estate back on its feet, and we need to change the passive loss provisions to see that happen.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is a necessary step in the right direction, and I commend the Ways and Means Committee for their efforts in putting this package together. I urge my colleagues to support this long awaited measure.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, last week, I was very pleased to see the Ways and Means Committee include the repeal of the luxury tax on boats in its latest tax bill. This action was a very positive development for Maine's boat building industry, at a time when such good news is in short supply.

The boat building industry in Maine has just been devastated by the boat tax. Hundreds of Mainers have lost their jobs, and the job security of the remaining employees at these small businesses is being seriously threatened, as long as this ill-fated tax remains in effect.

I have been actively involved in numerous, bipartisan efforts to repeal the 10-percent Federal excise tax on boats selling for more than $100,000. I met with a large group of boat builders at a town meeting in Ellsworth last April. At this meeting, those workers told me that the luxury tax on boats was decimating Maine's boat building industry, and companies were laying off highly skilled, workers due to a lack of orders. I publicly pledged to those workers that I was fully committed to doing anything, and everything, I can do to help repeal this tax.

For example, last April, I wrote a letter to joint bipartisan leadership of the House Ways and Means Committee urging the committee to hold public hearings to examine the impact that the tax is having on the domestic boat building industry. Later that month, I cosponsored H.R. 951, Congressman CLAY SHAW'S legislation to repeal the luxury tax.

In May, I introduced my own legislation repealing the luxury boat tax. That measure, H.R. 2487, also containing offset provisions to ensure that its impact on the Federal budget deficit would be minimized. In June, I testified before a Senate Finance Subcommittee in support of S. 649, legislation introduced by Senators BREAUX and CHAFEE to repeal the luxury boat tax.

In July, along with Congressman DICK ARMEY and Senator CONNIE MACK, I jointly released a Joint Economic Committee [JEC] report examining the impact that the luxury taxes on boats, planes, and jewelry is having on the economy. The Snowe-Mack JEC report concluded that the boat tax would cost the Federal government, on a net basis, $15 million in revenues and result in the loss of 7,600 jobs. Subsequently, Congressman ARMEY and I sent the Ways and Means Committee a copy of Snowe-Mack report and renewed our request for a public hearing to examine the impact the boat tax is having on the domestic boat building industry.

In November, I worked with several other Republican colleagues in a successful effort to get the House Republican economic recovery package to include provisions repealing all 5 new luxury taxes. This package was presented to President Bush by the House minority leadership. The next day, the President endorsed the package and urged the 102d Congress to adopt it. Unfortunately, this request was rejected by House Democratic leadership.

This past January, President Bush included repealing the luxury boat tax in his fiscal year 1993 budget proposal to the 102d Congress. Shortly thereafter, I joined with 73 other Members of the House wrote to Ways and Means Committee Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI expressing support for including the repeal of the luxury boat tax in any economic growth package that the committee developed this year.

In March, the full House of Representatives approved the final conference committee report on omnibus tax legislation, H.R. 4210. Included in the final version of this bill were provisions that repealed the 10-percent Federal excise tax on certain boats, airplanes, furs, and jewelry. However, President Bush voted H.R. 4210, citing the tax increases on upper income individuals as the primary reason for his opposition to the bill's enactment. The House failed to override the President's veto on March 25. As such, the provisions in H.R. 4210 repealing the luxury tax on boats, unfortunately, could not go into effect.

One of the primary reasons I supported H.R. 4210 on three separate occasions was the fact that it repealed the 10-percent Federal excise tax on boats costing more than $100,000. I voted in support of the original House bill, the final bill, and in support of overriding the President's veto of H.R. 4210, with the goal of repealing the luxury boat tax as a crucial provision that needed to be enacted into law as soon as possible

As the House considers H.R. 11 today, I urge all of my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to support this important bill. The prompt passage and enactment of this bill is essential to the continued viability of our domestic boat building industry.

Repealing the luxury tax on boats is a long overdue course of action. I hope that the Congress will be successful in its second attempt to repeal a tax that has not raised any appreciable revenues from the wealthy, but has instead put thousands of people across the nation out of work.

At a time when the economy is struggling to recover from a recession, repealing the boat tax is one good way for the Congress to demonstrate its commitment to helping make this recovery become a reality for thousands of working men and women in the United States.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, which has been falsely labeled an "urban aid package". It is nothing of the sort. The so-called antipoverty provisions of this bill are nothing more than a Potemkin Village constructed to obscure the $12 billion in tax breaks the bill offers wealthy corporations.

When I first read over the details of this package, I found little in it which was appealing or compelling, but I was prepared to support it because it at least offered something, a few token crumbs, to address the misery in urban America. With this bill, as with the Higher Education Act and so many others before it, we are told that we cannot do more to address the needs of low-income families because of the massive budget deficit. We have to take what we can get.

But we only seem to hear that argument in this body when we are considering legislation which seeks to help powerless poor people. Only poor people are told they must accept crumbs. When it considers any other piece of legislation, this body politely steps aside and allows the rich and greedy to amble up and gorge themselves at the trough of the Federal Treasury. The most egregious and expensive example of this, of course, is the S&L bailout, but we see examples of this inexcusable double standard literally every day this body meets. Just a few hours ago the House voted down an amendment which would have cut $700 million from the $3.5 billion provided for the star wars program in the Defense appropriations bill. There was never much to justify star wars even at the height of the cold war, and now with communism vanquished and both the United States and Russia speedily dismantling their nuclear armaments, it is a program devoid of rationale. And yet this body refuses to slice even a paltry amount from the billions we pump into this obsolete fantasy of the Pentagon and the military-industrial complex.

Enough is enough. I am sick of settling for crumbs.

This bill will do little or nothing to fight poverty in America. The backbone of this bill's putative antipoverty provisions is the designation of "enterprise zones" in 25 urban and 25 rural communities and the provision of tax incentives to businesses which locate in these areas. This is a feeble and ultimately counterproductive approach to addressing poverty because, even when and if it succeeds, an enterprise zone does not create new jobs—it just shifts them from one place to another. Its underlying premise—that there are more than enough jobs to go around for everyone who wants one—is demonstrably untrue in our currently depressed economy. Moreover, where enterprise zones have been tried, they have not proven very effective in attracting new businesses and investment into the zones. Few businesses have found the incentives sufficiently alluring to move into the zone, and those that have moved have tended to be service-sector businesses—fast-food franchises and the like—which do not provide the kind of jobs which pay enough to support a family or upon which a man or woman can build a career.

H.R. 11 does provide more tangible and effective aid to persons living in enterprise zones in the form of a 5-year $2.5 billion block grant that would be divided among the 50 designated zones—roughly $10 million per year per zone—and used to support job training, education, and social services, law enforcement, and housing development. This kind of assistance is urgently needed in every low-income community in America and yet this bill limits the aid to a mere 50 neighborhoods nationwide. Instead of addressing long-term unemployment and the problems of all low-income families fully and comprehensively, this bill gives us a token effort that will only reach and help a fraction of the Nation's poor.

I am also concerned that the enterprise zones in H.R. 11 are badly targeted and are unlikely to be designated in the most distressed and poverty-stricken areas of this Nation. The legislation gives the administration sufficient latitude to use the awarding of zone designations as a political tool, handing them out to those communities in which they can provide the maximum political benefits to the Bush administration.

While this bill will do little to help poor people in America, it will do much to line the pockets of American corporations by providing an astonishing $12 billion in tax breaks. Some of these, including the targeted jobs tax credit and the low-income housing tax credit, are worthwhile and should be reauthorized. But H.R. 11 would also create an obscene abundance of expensive new tax breaks for corporations. The luxury tax on boats and yachts which cost more than $100,000 and on furs and jewelry which cost more than $10,000 would be repealed. Faster depreciation of assets would be provided to corporations under the alternative minimum tax, a new tax break of $1.4 billion. The Federal Express Corp. would get a special tax benefit it has been seeking to help it defeat a union organizing among its pilots. And most ludicrously of all, H.R. 11 gives corporations a tax writeoff for goodwill such as customer loyalty. If someone proposed something comparable for individual taxpayers—such as getting a tax writeoff for having a good personal reputation or being renowned for their cooking—they would be laughed off Capitol Hill. And yet here in this bill is much the same kind of giveaway for corporations and no one even cracks a smile.

More than 20 years ago, Martin Luther King, Jr., described dissent against social injustice as "America's hope". He urged us to recognize that standing up and speaking out against indignity and injustice may make some people feel uncomfortable, it may get you called arrogant or ungrateful, but it is utterly necessary and utterly American:

> It shines in the long tradition of American ideals that began with courageous minutemen in New England that continued in the abolitionist movement, that re-emerged in the populist revolt and, decades later, that burst forth to elect Franklin Roosevelt and John F. Kennedy. Today's dissenters tell the complacent majority that the time has come when further evasion of social responsibility in a turbulent world will court disaster and death. America has not yet changed because so many think it need not change, but this is the illusion of the damned. America must change because twenty-three million black citizens will no longer live supinely in a wretched past. They have left the valley of despair; they have found strength in struggle; and whether they live or die, they shall not crawl nor retreat again. Joined by white allies, they will shake the prison walls until they fall. America must change.

In my community and in communities throughout the Nation, there is growing outrage against what is perceived to be smug and somnolent leadership in Washington which does not respond to the problems real people face in their lives. You need look no further than this pathetic bill to see how right they are in that assessment. What began as an effort to respond substantively to the horrible misery and privation of inner city Americans has now become a vehicle for shoveling yet another $12 billion in tax breaks into the Treasury trough at which big business already feeds and fattens itself. Is there no shame?

Mr. Speaker, I dissent today. I refuse to participate in the illusion of the damned. America—and this Congress—must change and I must vote "no."

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my opposition to H.R. 11, the urban aid bill, before us today. As a Member who represents a community in Chicago that has been devastated by Reagan/Bush anticities policies, I feel that it is critical that we begin to focus our attention on the needs of our cities. I cannot in good faith lend my support to this measure because for purely political motive this measure has been drafted and not considered. I cannot perpetrate a lie to those suffering in urban areas, because this measure in no way assists the crises currently existing in this Nation's inner cities, including the city of Chicago.

While H.R. 11 assists by extending several expiring tax credits, including the targeted jobs tax credit and low-income housing tax credit, which I have historically supported. I believe that our leaders have not been innovative in the approach to improve our economy. This legislation takes a very traditional approach to an enormous problem. Instead of funding programs that in the past have truly assisted our cities by creating jobs and rebuilding the infrastructure, the effort is to again spur the economy through tax incentives to corporate America and the wealthy. We have taken this approach over and over again, and it is clear to me the product of this trickle-down mentality has been the turmoil we've seen nationwide in our cities and towns.

I just believe that we ought to be honest about this bill because it does not truly aid urban America. Only $2.5 billion of the bill's $14 billion is even dedicated to urban areas under the enterprise zone provision, and there is no requirement that these zones be located in economically disadvantaged areas. The administration has been successful in serving their wealthy constituents by securing a capital gains tax break which does absolutely nothing to improve inner-city conditions. And finally, I am gravely disappointed that the special provision, which clearly undermines the right of Federal Express pilots to unionize, has been attached to this legislation. This provision should be removed.

Mr. Speaker, while some will vote for this bill because they believe that some help is better than none at all, I cannot participate in what amounts to an election year hoax. If we do not begin to commit ourselves to addressing the plight of our urban cities, then we jeopardize the future of our country as a whole. Domestic reform must surge to the top of list of issues for immediate attention. Until our leaders in this Congress, as well as in the Bush administration, begin to expose themselves to urban areas beyond the extent of 5-minute media plugs after a major riot, we cannot expect them to make realistic decisions.

We must directly invest in the people of this Nation if we are going to make our cities productive again. Be it Los Angeles, New York City, or Chicago, the boiling point is literally just around the corner. The Congress must appropriately respond, negating their basic interest in being reelected. The pain and suffering is great in our urban areas and the response ought to directly address the need.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that the provisions of section 4501 of H.R. 11, the Revenue Act of 1992, dealing with the amortization of certain intangibles, could be counterproductive.

I recognize that legislative clarification should be given for certain intangibles such as customer lists. For many small businesses, a customer list is the major asset, and it is an asset which can lose value over time as demographic and economic factors change. Hence, there should be a clear amortization schedule for these intangible assets.

Section 4501, however, goes beyond intangible assets such as customer lists and embraces a broader and more problematic set of intangible assets, particularly goodwill. Goodwill is the intangible quality of a business based on many subjective factors such as reputation. Because goodwill is difficult to quantify it can be susceptible to manipulation. This problem is further exacerbated in the context of corporate acquisitions. The possibility of deducting goodwill could inflate acquisition prices or, alternatively stated, justify excessive acquisition prices not on economic grounds but because of tax benefits. The 1980's were replete with leveraged buyout transactions driven not by the economic potential of the enterprise but by tax advantages. When these tax advantages were exhausted, the underlying value of the firm was insufficient to justify continued operations under the burden of acquisition debt. As a result, thousands of jobs were lost and hundreds of firms failed.

Section 4501 raises the possibility of a repetition of some of the disastrous mergers and acquisitions of the 1980's. In sum, it could create artificial transactions based on the Tax Code and not the productivity and economic value of a business. If amendments were in order during consideration of H.R. 11, I would have voted to delete section 4501.

Mr. SANTORUM. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the work of the members of the Ways and Means Committee on the Revenue Act of 1992. There are several provisions I wholeheartedly support.

The luxury tax which Congress imposed on the American workers has had the expected detrimental effect, and was by many estimates a revenue loser. It proves again that increasing the burden of taxes to penalize Americans who have achieved the American dream throws working Americans out of work while damaging the economy. This bill repeals this counterproductive tax, and which should be repealed. I also support the provisions which will stabilize the real estate market. Passive loss relief will promote more investment in low- and moderate-income housing. In addition, a permanent extension of the low-income housing credit and the mortgage revenue bond provisions provide a continued incentive to invest in needed housing for all Americans.

There is a provision in this bill I support very strongly in principle, but am disturbed that it does not go far enough to be truly effective. I am speaking of enterprise zones. First, the incentives for job creation in the bill are only a small piece of Secretary Kemp's proposals. Stronger tax and regulatory incentives must be included if enterprise zones are to really be given a chance to succeed and meet the economic needs of many economically distressed communities.

Second, communities in and around Pittsburgh deserve to be designated an enterprise zone. I support very strongly the concept of enterprise zones. There are quite a few economically distressed areas in western Pennsylvania, and in fact in my district communities like McKeesport, Clairton, Duquesne, and Braddock, which have been neglected for years. There are hard-working, able people in these communities that want to work, but for many different reasons industry no longer finds their communities attractive to invest in.

More enterprise zone areas must be allowed to qualify than the 50 approved of in the bill. As I have said, incentives to business locating in these zones should be even greater. This is an initiative which, if it had been instituted 10 years ago, could have arrested the decay of our urban communities, and perhaps many of the people in my district who have seen such hard times would be employed, or if retired, would have the savings now to visit children and grandchildren in other places. Under a more comprehensive scheme, such as Secretary Kemp's proposal, many of the municipalities in my district would qualify for special tax treatment, much needed jobs would be created, and economic and community vitality would have been nurtured.

The solution to many of our urban problems is the creation of gainful employment. I hope that the passage of this bill indicates a willingness on the part of the Congress to support enterprise zones generally in all areas of need. I will work very hard in support of a bill which is broad enough to include Pittsburgh communities in its enterprise zone provisions.

Finally, I am pleased to support this bill with the understanding that it does abide by the Budget Enforcement Act. Through this bill, we will accomplish both needed job creation and economic growth without creating a greater debt burden for our children. The Congress is still irresponsible in regards to much of the spending legislation it passes, but my hope is that this measure will be a positive contribution to our children's future rather than a detriment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 11, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 356, nays 55, answered "present" 1, not voting 22, as follows:

Mr. WISE changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF PUBLIC HEARING ON SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, I announce that a public hearing will be conducted on the subject of the disparity of Social Security benefits, sometimes called the notch controversy, on the 23d of this month of July at 10 a.m. in room 1100, Longworth Building.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST AND DURING CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5517, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1993

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 102-651) on the resolution (H. Res. 509) waiving certain points of order against and during consideration of the bill (H.R. 5517) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1993, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5100, TRADE EXPANSION ACT OF 1992

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 102-652) on the resolution (H. Res. 510) providing for consideration of the bill (H.R. 5100) to strengthen the international trade position of the United States, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 5260, UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION AMENDMENTS OF 1992

Mr. BEILENSON, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 102-653) on the resolution (H. Res. 511) waiving points of order against the conference report on the bill (H.R. 5260) to extend the Emergency Unemployment Compensation Program, to revise the trigger provisions contained in the Extended Unemployment Program, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT CHARGES IN THE NAVY

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, earlier today the House considered the Defense appropriation bill, and I rise now to commend and thank our colleague, Chairman MURTHA, for his immediate and determined response to the sexual harassment of women aviators at the Navy's Tailhook Convention. When we considered the Defense appropriations bill in our full committee, members of the committee commended the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] for the actions that he had taken and I want to convey some of those comments to this body.

Chairman MURTHA acted quickly for a full investigation and for full accountability. He also moved quickly to reduce Navy funding to send a message to the Navy that women would not be subjected to this type of behavior.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will join in commending our colleague, Chairman MURTHA, again for his sensitivity, his courage, and his sense of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend and thank my colleague, Chairman MURTHA, for his immediate and determined response to the sexual harassment of women aviators at the Navy's Tailhook Convention. Chairman MUR-

THA acted swiftly for a full investigation and full accountability. He also moved quickly to reduce Navy funding to send the message that women would not be subjected to this type of behavior. The individual aviators who participated in the incident, as well as their commanders, must be reprimanded and accept responsibility for their degrading behavior. Department of Defense policies must also protect anyone in the Armed Forces who is treated unjustly.

Mr. Speaker, this incident points to the larger issue that is commonplace in the Armed Forces for women. Women face discrimination, harassment, and degradation in the face of doing their jobs. Women have not yet been integrated into the Armed Services where men and women work side by side and in unison, but rather they are at odds with each other. The policies of the Department of Defense are not sensitive to the concerns of women.

I would also like to commend Lt. Paula Coughlin for her courage and determination in speaking out against the behavior of drunken aviators. It is difficult for a woman to come forward to discuss the details of degrading behavior, especially when her own superior does not take her seriously.

I commend my colleague and friend, Chairman MURTHA, again for his sensitivity, courage, and sense of justice.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. PELOSI. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I just would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentlewoman in commending the chairman of the Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations for his very decisive action. I think it made us very proud as Members of this House that somebody would finally act in that decisive manner on this absolutely unacceptable behavior.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 3221

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of the bill, H.R. 3221.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TORRES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I asked unanimous consent to speak for 1 minute in order to ask the distinguished chairman of the Democratic Caucus concerning the schedule for the balance of the day and the schedule for the action-packed week between Independence Day and the Democratic Convention.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to yield to my very good friend, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentleman from California for yielding to me.

We have completed our legislative business for today, Mr. Speaker. The House will be in recess tomorrow and on Monday in observance of the birthday of our Nation, July 4.

We will come back into session on July 7, on which day we will consider six suspensions: H.R. 3562, regarding the Customs forfeiture fund, H.R. 5269, to add to the area in which the Capitol police have law enforcement authority, a bill of general interest to the country.

H.R. 3836, the Pacific Yew Act, an unnumbered House resolution regarding the New England groundfish restoration, H.R. 4310, the national marine sanctuaries reauthorization, H.R. 1435, Rocky Mountain Arsenal wildlife refuge. Votes on all of those suspension bills, if any, will be rolled until the end of the day on Wednesday, the following day. So we do not expect any votes on the floor on Tuesday.

On Wednesday, July 8, we will expect to meet very late with legislative votes possibly as early as 11 a.m. Members need to know possible votes will be as early as 11 a.m.

During Wednesday we will be considering H.R. 5100, the Trade Expansion Act of 1992, subject to a rule, an unnumbered bill, the District of Columbia appropriations for fiscal 1993, subject to a rule, and H.R. 3553, higher education reauthorization conference report.

On Thursday we also expect to meet very late in the evening, and we will be considering the Department of Transportation appropriations bill for fiscal 1993, subject to a rule, and any other possible legislation either held over from the prior day or that may come up prior to that time. We do not expect any votes nor do we expect to be in session on Friday. The House will then adjourn, and the Democratic Convention will be held the following week.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank my friend.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire: A number of people on this side of the aisle have asked is the order in which the gentleman outlined the three bills to be considered on Wednesday, July 8, accurate? Are we planning to proceed with first the trade bill, then the District of Columbia and then higher education, in that order?

Mr. HOYER. I will tell my friend, the distinguished gentleman from California, right now it is accurate. I say that only because, as the gentleman well knows, the vagaries of the legislative process are that there may be one bill that will proceed the other which is listed out of order here.

Mr. DREIER of California. Well, as my friend knows, we had an incredibly unique experience this week when three rules were considered in very, very different order, several different times and way beyond the schedule. That is why we are wondering whether it is planned at this point to begin with the trade bill first thing on Wednesday morning.

Mr. HOYER. The present plan is that that is what we will do.

But as the gentleman from the Committee on Rules knows so well, "the best laid plans."

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEACH. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as the distinguished spokesperson for the majority party knows, 15 months ago the President of the United States requested that this Congress act on replenishment of International Monetary Fund. On April 1 of this year he made a plea to the Congress to act on a Freedom Act for the former Soviet Union and asked that it be passed by the Congress before Mr. Yeltsin visited the United States. As yet, the House of Representatives has not scheduled consideration of this massively important bill. And I raise it in two contexts: First, the longer we delay the less likelihood of a sympathetic hearing; but second, and of extraordinary significance, that because it relates to an international financial institution, that the Congress is delaying not only United States participation in this plan but the participation of all of our allies who are going to match our contribution by a 4-to-1 ratio.

In other words, this Congress is delaying not only an executive branch initiative in our country but an accepted executive branch initiative in all of the other major capitals of the Western world and Japan.

I just plead with the gentleman to give serious consideration for the timing of this particular initiative which the President, on behalf of the American public, has placed so much import upon.

Could the gentleman enlighten us on whether there is a scheduled consideration for the Freedom Support Act?

Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentleman for his comments and observations. And if the gentleman will yield——

Mr. DREIER of California. I am happy to.

Mr. HOYER. In responding to the gentleman, as the gentleman knows, the other body is considering this legislation. I do not know that they passed it today. But assuming they did, this body will, I think, move on that legislation to address it in the near term. I do not have a date for the gentleman.

Mr. LEACH. If the gentleman could yield for one clarification: Is this a commitment that it will be considered before the August recess? That seems very reasonable to this gentleman. I think we are late now, but if it is put into September, it is a totally different kind of aura for consideration.

So I would urge the gentleman, within his leadership, to, if at all conceivable, do this as early in July as possible. Is that possible?

Mr. HOYER. I appreciate the gentleman's comments. As the gentleman well knows, I would have to consult, clearly, with the committees of jurisdiction before I can accurately answer that question. I do not want to do that. But I will tell the gentleman that I will bring his concern, which is shared by the majority leader——

Mr. LEACH. I know, many on both sides of the aisle, I appreciate that.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank my friend or his question.

I would like to inquire of the distinguished caucus chairman if the votes on the suspensions are going to be held following the consideration of the three bills set for Wednesday, July 8, and he said we are going to be going late into the night if we finish, as we have this week, at midnight, will we then be at midnight voting on the suspensions that were considered the day before?

Mr. HOYER. That might occur, but we will certainly consult with your side of the aisle, trying to accommodate Members. And if we got that late, we may well do it the first thing the following morning. But it is our present plan to do it late and, hopefully, it won't be—when we say late—not that late.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank my friend, and I wish him a happy, a very happy Independence Day.

DISPENSING WITH CALL OF PRIVATE CALENDAR ON TUESDAY, JULY 7, 1992

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the Private Calendar be dispensed with on Tuesday, July 7, 1992.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. Torres). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL TO ACQUIRE CERTAIN PROPERTY

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2938) to authorize the Architect of the Capitol to acquire certain property, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so in order to ask my colleague and friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Kildee] to explain the legislation.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KILDEE. I thank the gentleman for yielding and for his question.

Mr. Speaker, this bill assists the Senate in its continuing efforts to provide Senate pages with a safe and suitable place in which to reside while in Washington. It allows the Architect of the Capitol to procure and improve page residence facilities.

There will be two adjacent townhouses which can be brought up to code. They are suitable. I think as a matter of comity with the Senate, and for the safety of the pages, that we should process without delay.

Mr. Speaker, I am chairman of the Page Board for the House. We have accommodated the Senate pages to the degree possible in our facilities, but we really are depriving our own pages of space for recreation and for study.

I think we should proceed with this. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. Thomas] for his very necessary question.

Mr. THOMAS of California. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

S. 2938

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. AUTHORITY OF THE ARCHITECT.

(a) Acquisition of Property.—The Architect of the Capitol, under the direction of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, may acquire, on behalf of the United States Government, by purchase, condemnation, transfer or otherwise, as an addition to the United States Capitol Grounds, all publicly and privately owned real property in lots 34 and 35 in square 758 in the District of Columbia as those lots appear on the records in the Office of the Surveyor of the District of Columbia as of the date of the enactment of this Act, extending to the outer face of the curbs of the square in which such lots are located and including all alleys or parts of alleys and streets within the lot lines and curb lines surrounding such real property, together with all improvements thereon.

(b) United States Capitol Grounds and Buildings.—Immediately upon the acquisition by the Architect of the Capitol, on behalf of the United States, of the real property, and the improvements thereon, as provided under subsection (a), the real property acquired shall be a part of the United States Capitol Grounds, and the improvements on such real property and improvements shall be subject to the Act of July 31, 1946 (40 U.S.C. 193a et seq.), and the Act of June 8, 1942 (40 U.S.C. 174c).

(c) Building Codes.—The real property and improvements acquired in accordance with subsection (a) shall be repaired and altered, to the maximum extent feasible as determined by the Architect of the Capitol, in accordance with a nationally recognized model building code, and other applicable nationally recognized codes (including electrical codes, fire and life safety codes, and plumbing codes, as determined by the Architect of the Capitol), using the most current edition of the nationally recognized codes referred to in this subsection.

(d) Repairs; Expenditures.—The Architect of the Capitol is authorized, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to enter into contracts and to make expenditures for necessary repairs to, and refurbishment of, the real property and the improvements on such real property acquired in accordance with subsection (a), including expenditures for personal and other services as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. In no event shall the aggregate value of contracts and expenditures under this subsection exceed an amount equal to that authorized to be appropriated pursuant to subsection (e).

(e) Authorization.—There is authorized to be appropriated to the account under the heading "Architect of the Capitol" and the subheadings "Capitol Buildings and Grounds" and "Senate Office Buildings", $2,000,000 for carrying out the purposes of this Act. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this authorization may remain available until expended.

(f) Use of Property.—The real property, and improvements thereon, acquired in accordance with subsection (a) shall be available to the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate for use as a residential facility for United States Senate Pages, and for such other purposes as the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration may provide.

(g) Capitol Police Jurisdiction.—In carrying out its supervision and jurisdiction over the real property and improvements acquired in accordance with subsection (a) by reason of their acquisition as a part of the United States Capitol Grounds and Buildings, the United States Capitol Police shall have the additional authority to make arrests for the violation of any law of the United States or the District of Columbia, or any regulation issued pursuant thereto, within any area or street in the District of Columbia outside the United States Capitol Grounds necessary to carry out such supervision or jurisdiction over such acquired real property and improvements, and to travel between parts of the United States Capitol Grounds which are not contiguous. The authority provided the Capitol Police by this subsection to make arrests within any such area or street shall be concurrent with that of the Metropolitan Police of the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KILDEE

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on S. 2938, the Senate bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TORRES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KILDEE]?

There was no objection.

TAILHOOK

(Mr. CUNNINGHAM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, for my comments I would like to make comment on the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], the gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE] concerning the Tailhook, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA]. This afternoon the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] made comments on Tailhook and lumped all the top four, quote, heavies into one category along with the Tailhook, and I spoke to the gentlewoman, and she changed her testimony because what we are trying to do, and many people are trying to do, is tar and feather across the board our military men and women that represent this country honorably.

Was Paula Kaufman molested? Was she assaulted? Yes, in my opinion, she was assaulted not only a little bit, but criminally, and that should be taken care of.

I would ask that the Members that continue to make political heyday out of the Tailhook Association refrain from lumping everybody into one package, and, as far as the statements, I laud the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURTHA] on the Committee on Appropriations for making actions toward the Tailhook, but to fire 10,000 people out of the Navy that had nothing to do with Tailhook and to commend him for that is ludicrous. I condemn it, it is wrong, and those people are suffering needlessly.

TAILHOOK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, as I begin my remarks on a special order, I want to recognize what the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] just said about not branding all members of an organization, the Navy, the Tailhook or any other organizations with a broad brush, and I have avoided doing that, but I have to say that my constituents and this Member are outraged by the sexual assaults and misconduct directed at 26 women by Navy aviators at the annual Tailhook convention in Las Vegas. The convention of the Tailhook organization of current and past Navy and Marine aviators, are now noted, according to the Washington Post, June 27, 1992, as "an annual event known for its raucous and sometimes lewd atmosphere." The New York Times of the same date noted that the Tailhook convention was "renowned for rowdy parties that featured strippers, pornographic movies and heavy drinking." They continued by indicating that "the party on the third-floor of the Las Vegas Hilton was well known to conventioneers * * * as was the existence of gangs of drunken aviators that groped, fondled and assaulted women as they stepped off an elevator." Of at least 26 women assaulted, according to a Washington Post article of June 24, 1992, more than half were themselves Navy officers.

Mr. Speaker, this situation is intolerable, as is the apparent coverup in the Navy. In light of the detailed reports of sexual harassment of women students at the U.S. Naval Academy widely reported last year, these activities seem to point to a very serious problem in the Navy. From information being released daily now it is unfortunately all too clear that those are not isolated occurrences. Too many people have turned their heads instead of facing and correcting these attacks on women.

Mr. Speaker, the two armed service committees of this Congress must be more aggressive in oversight and action to stop this sexual abuse of women members, and civilians, by officers or enlisted men in our armed services. The Navy should end any association with, and discourage attendance by its personnel at Tailhook conventions unless it cleans up its act and corrects this abusive, offensive and criminal conduct by some attendees. The armed services committees should also seek the identity of active duty or reserve naval aviators at the past and recent Tailhook conventions and take such decisive and appropriate disciplinary actions as are possible.

Mr. Speaker, I would conclude by agreeing with the gentleman from California [Mr. CUNNINGHAM] that that kind of discipline or impact should not be made on all members of a very distinguished service, the enlisted men and officers of the U.S. Navy. Be very careful in targeting top people who are responsible for the abuse or who tolerated it, but let us not take it out on the Navy per se.

MILAN PANIC, PRIME MINISTER OF YUGOSLAVIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, a successful Serbian-American businessman, Mr. Milan Panic, held a press conference this morning to announce his acceptance to head the first non-Communist Federal Government of Yugoslavia since 1941.

According to the statement he read this morning, his primary goals as Prime Minister of Yugoslavia will be, and I quote:

> First, to stop the fighting and to work for real and lasting peace. Second, to establish an environment in which a free, multi-ethnic and multi-religious society can flourish. Democratic principles, the right to free speech and a free press, drew me to America. The pursuit of these principles draws me back to Belgrade.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mr. Milan Panic for his committment to democratic principles, and sincerely hope that bipartisan support from this legislative body to the democratic reforms he plans to undertake in Yugoslavia, will result in a genuine renewal of stability in the entire Balkans. He applied for and received the necessary license to go to Yugoslavia from the U.S. Treasury Department.

Mr. Panic already has pledged to adhere to sound and rational policies when he assumes his new role in Yugoslavia today. I continue quoting from his statement to the press:

> With the Federal government's authority over the Yugoslav regular army, I will continue to ensure that no regular army troops are in neighboring republics. The government will strongly oppose any activity by any irregulars.

Mr. Panic's potential role in stopping the colossal civil war that has been raging in Yugoslavia for over a year now is one that should be acknowledged internationally, especially at this critical time when there is a possibility that the conflict may ensnare the entire Balkans.

I hope that Mr. Panic will persevere in his efforts to bring about peace in the Balkans. It is my fervent prayer that his presence as Prime Minister of Yugoslavia and Dobrica Cosic as President of Yugoslavia will expedite the removal of the last remnants of Communist rule there for all time.

Mr. Speaker, because so much of the atrocity news we have been receiving from the tragic area that once was Yugoslavia, has been aimed at the Serbs. I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues 2 messages that have been received by my office today.

THE ORTHODOX METROPOLITAN OF THE ZAGREB-LJUBLJANA DIOCESE IN LJUBLJANA

TO INTERNATIONAL MASS MEDIA: In view of the extremely difficult situation in the part of the Zagreb-Ljubljana diocese outside the Republic of Slovenia, the Office of the Serbian Orthodox Church for Slovenia and the Zagreb-Ljubljana Metropolitan, Jovan, are compelled to address in this way the broader political and religious public opinion and draw attention to certain facts which are in violation of elementary moral and civilizational standards:

In spite of the intercession by Amnesty International, the priest of the local Orthodox Church of Koprivnica (Croatia), monk Nikolaj Marunic, has been kept in prison in Bjelovar for more than a month without any evidence of guilt;

Forcible catechization of children of the Serbian Orthodox faith according to the rules of the Roman Catholic Church, and their preparation for the Holy Communion and confirmation, continue; Orthodox priests who refuse to issue certificates of baptism for these purposes and children who on their own refuse to yield to pressures are harassed;

After the recent demolition of the diocesan seat in Zagreb, the blasting of churches in the provinces outside the UNPROFOR-protected areas and desecration of the Orthodox church in Zagreb continue;

Serbs in Zagreb do not receive any aid from international humanitarian organizations, so that some families are literally starving.

We hereby appeal to the international public to direct part of its attention, without any political, national or religious prejudices, to the Zagreb-Ljubljana diocese of the Serbian Orthodox Church.

JOVAN.

MEMO

According to news from Belgrade on July 1, Croatian forces conquered and demolished with bulldozers the Serb village of Tasovice today, which is in Hercegovina on the left bank of the river Neretva. Two neighboring Serbian villages were also demolished.

Belgrade also reports that the Serbian Orthodox Church in the city of Capljina also was demolished by the Croats on July 1. Capljina is a town in Western Hercegovina where Croats constitute the majority of the population and Serbs face every day discrimination.

In its news bulletin #64, dated July 1, 1992, the Serbian Press Agency "Srna" reports that the Croatian Army launched 30 mortars on the eastern Hercegovina city of Trebinje on June 29, 1992. Serbs make up the majority of the population in Trebinje and the mortars were fired exclusively at civilian objects.

The citizens of Trebinje are in their basements, and the city's officials reported one civilian heavily wounded. Croatian Army forces are launching the mortars from their positions at Beli Osojnik, which is above the Rijeka Dubrovacka and in the neigboring Republic of Croatia.

The bombardment of Trebinje by the Croatian Army on June 29 was the seventh in the past month. A total of over 300 shells have fallen on this city since the attacks started.

I hope that the United Nations will look into these as it has others.

OCTANE REPLACEMENT ACT OF 1992

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OWENS of New York). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JONTZ] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, America's farmers can do much more to help our Nation meet its energy needs. America's farmers have the capacity to produce corn and other agricultural products which can be used to make ethanol, which is a safe and clean and domestically produced product that could be used to a much greater extent than today.

Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago this House considered a very important energy bill which includes a number of worthwhile provisions to move our Nation toward energy independence. Regrettably, one of the provisions which was not included was the increased use of ethanol to help us meet our octane needs in this country.

Legislation which I have introduced with the coauthorship of the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague on the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. EWING, would help our country to move toward the greater use of this domestically produced product, ethanol, to meet the octane needs of our country.

This bill, the Octane Replacement Act of 1992, directs the Secretary of Energy, beginning in 1994, to establish a program to require the use of domestically produced, renewable, nonpetroleum octane enhancers in the United States gasoline supply.

We have the technology for using ethanol as an octane enhancer. A number of companies are now using ethanol as an octane enhancer. But we should be doing much more.

The program that our proposal would require is the establishment of at least a minimum of one-half octane number of the octane rating of all gasoline sold in the United States beginning in March 1994 from domestically produced, renewable, nonpetroleum sources.

This octane number requirement would then be increased incrementally every 4 years, until at least 2 octane numbers were derived from ethanol by March of the year 2006.

Why do we need this legislation? When lead was phased out of gasoline, a decision was made about what would be replacing lead to improve octane in our Nation's gasoline supply.

One choice was to use alcohol. The other choice was to use aromatic hydrocarbons, chemicals which the petroleum companies distill from crude oil.

Not surprisingly, the oil companies chose to add aromatic hydrocarbons to gasoline, chemicals like benzene, toluene, and xylene. These chemicals have high octane content, but they also cause toxic emissions into the environment. They are also made from imported petroleum.

Alcohol is an effective source of octane which is domestically produced from corn or other agricultural products that we grow here in the United States. Its use will reduce toxic emissions. Its use will create jobs here in the United States.

If our Nation continues to allow the oil companies by themselves to decide where we will obtain the octane needs of this country, it is without doubt that the oil companies will probably prefer to use the aromatic hydrocarbons, furthering our dependence on imported oil.

The Congress of the United States ought to recognize this and to take action to require the use of ethanol, because it promotes our Nation's energy security by using a domestically produced renewable source. In fact, under the provisions of the legislation introduced by myself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EWING] we would be replacing 80 million barrels of imported oil by the year 1994, and 300 million barrels of imported oil by the year 2006.

Our legislation would result in a tenfold increase in ethanol use over this 12-year phase-in period. This would mean nearly triple the corn consumption for ethanol production beginning in 1994, to about 800 million bushels to 960 million bushels. By the end of the proposed phase-in period, in the range of 3.2 to 3.8 billion bushels of corn would be consumed in our country for ethanol production.

Other agricultural commodities, even municipal garbage, could be used to meet these ethanol requirements. But the point is these are domestically produced products. Why do we continue to import oil into the United States to meet octane needs when we could be meeting those needs here at home?

It is important to point out this can be done without damage to the Clean Air Act. Our legislation is written in such a way that we can avoid any air quality problems, in fact, can achieve a very desirable purpose in reducing toxics from the use of aromatic hydrocarbons where that is not necessary.

This legislation also would not incur costs to the consumer. In fact, the price of ethanol is now about $1.20 a gallon. That compares favorably to the cost of benzene of about $1.25 a gallon. Oftentime the oil companies would have us believe that to replace gasoline with ethanol will cost the consumer. But in fact if one brings about the desired results by using ethanol as an octane enhancer, the consumer is not incurring any additional costs at all.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that this provision can be brought back to the House, because I believe the Congress recognizes the important role ethanol can play in meeting this Nation's energy needs. We lost a vote on an amendment to the energy bill by a very narrow margin because of concerns that some Members had about how this amendment might affect the Clean Air Act. Since that time, I have been able to work with the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN], whose role in protecting the air quality of this country is well-known, and reach agreement with Mr. WAXMAN about some language which would satisfy his concerns about the Clean Air Act.

We can meet our Nation's clean air goals. We can use ethanol, which is a renewable product. This will create jobs in the United States, this will help the agriculture producers of our country with additional farm income. This will help the taxpayers of our country by reducing the need for farm program payments. All of these benefits can occur if we will pass legislation in this Congress to increase the use of ethanol.

There is very little that we can do this year that will move our Nation as far ahead toward energy independence, toward improving farm income, toward creating jobs in the United States for our workers, than bringing about an increased use of ethanol.

Mr. Speaker, my hope is that this issue will come before the Congress again and the Congress will take a stand for jobs, for farm income, for a clean environment, for domestically produced products, by passing the Octane Replacement Act.

THE BENEFITS OF THE REVENUE ACT OF 1992

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. OWENS of New York). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening the House took up and passed by a very resounding margin, 356 to 55, the bill H.R. 11, the urban aid package. I appreciate very much the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], the manager of the bill, yielding to me, in view of the fact so many Members wanted time and he had so little to yield, in my remarks I thanked him from the citizens of Louisville and the citizens of Jefferson County, the citizens I am very privileged to represent here in the House of Representatives. On their behalf I thanked the gentleman for having brought this bill to the floor, a bill designed to help the urban areas of our country.

Really, to know the full extent of the gentleman's work, we have to go back to last week, June 22, when we passed the bill which was basically the bill to aid Los Angeles and the city of Chicago. That bill contained $500 million for a summer jobs program for the young people of America. Just interestingly enough and timely enough, a few weeks before we reach that vote last week I had taken a tour of many urban areas within my city of Louisville in the company of Rev. Louis Coleman, Alderman Bill Wilson, and State Representative Porter Hatcher, among others, and I saw firsthand how deeply we need jobs in our inner cities. So the first thing the gentleman did last week was to bring us his program of summer jobs in the urban aid bill, which is constituted of several parts, including the creation of 50 enterprise zones in the United States enacted today.

I would like to say that in Louisville we have created under State law a very successful enterprise zone which, according to data supplied to me by the Office of Economic Development in Louisville, in Jefferson County, in the fiscal years 1983 through 1991, has created some 12,700 jobs, has secured the investment of capital to the extent of $1.3 billion, and in just the one fiscal year, 1991, created 2,600 jobs and secured the investment of $190 million.

Earlier the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY] said that she was for this bill because there was a chance now to find out if enterprise zones work, and I would tell my friend, the gentlewoman from Connecticut, that they do work in Kentucky and will work across the country.

There are 25 enterprise zones created for the cities, 25 for the rural areas. I would like to see the ratio change. It seems to me that the urban areas need them more, but that is for another time. Firms that either locate in a zone or expand within a zone are entitled to a 50 percent exclusion from capital gains for profits which they make from investments in the zone held for 5 years. All taxes on profits earned within that zone are deferred. There is a 15-percent wage credit for employers who employ zone residents in these businesses, and that is on the first $20,000 of wages up to $3,000 total.

There is a certain criteria set up, or there are criteria set up including unemployment rates and poverty rates, and I would say parenthetically that I believe my community would qualify, and I intend to work with our friends back home to have our area designated. There is also, Mr. Speaker, in the bill today a Weed and Seed Program costing some $25 billion over the next 5 years, which is to weed out from the enterprise zones those malefactors, those brigands, those troublemakers who have hurt the urban residents and maybe have deterred businesses from locating there. After weeding out that unsavory crew we seed those areas with job training, education, health and nutrition programs, community development, and certainly crime prevention to make sure that the businesses flourish.

Mr. Speaker, also in this bill, H.R. 11, are tax provisions making permanent certain tax provisions, including three very important to Louisville and Jefferson County: The low-income housing tax credit I am told by Jim Allen, director of Louisville's housing program, that one-quarter of the 1,200 residents of rental housing built in Louisville since 1986 have used the low-income housing tax credit.

The mortgage revenue bond program is made permanent. Also made permanent is the targeted jobs tax credit, which enable employers to hire economically disadvantaged young people. Extended for 18 months, Mr. Speaker, is the employer-provided educational assistance tax credit.

If there is ever a time when we need to have an educated work force, it is now. This enables the employer to exclude from taxable income some of the tuitions that are paid on behalf of their employees. Also extended is the research and development tax credit, and is there ever a more propitious time to have America get active in research and development to become and remain competitive.

We also extend in the bill, Mr. Speaker, for 6 months the health insurance deduction enjoyed by individually self-employed persons. Last, Mr. Speaker, provisions that are not given the same attention today in the debate, but in the bill is a provision to allow deductions for the fair market value of properties contributed to charities for the purpose of qualifying under the alternative minimum tax. There is also the reinstatement of the passive losses, which are involved in the real estate industry.

The luxury tax is repealed, and last but not least, Mr. Speaker, there is the reinstitution of a taxpayer bill of rights to enable the men and women of America to understand more easily the tax system, and if they feel they have been unfairly pressed upon by the Internal Revenue Service, they now have a mechanism to fight back.

I sum up, Mr. Speaker, by saying this is a very happy day for the citizens of Louisville and Jefferson County, my community, my hometown, because of the work done by many people on the bill, H.R. 11, which passed resoundingly this afternoon.

INTRODUCING THE URBAN ENTREPRENEUR OPPORTUNITIES ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FRANKS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. FRANKS of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, it was with mixed emotion that I supported H.R. 11, the Revenue Act bill. There are many excellent proposals included in the bill. However, I had grave concerns with the enterprise zone legislation, despite my strong advocacy of the concept.

In my State and in 36 other States we have enterprise zones. I have a State-sponsored enterprise zone in my hometown of Waterbury, and so did riot-torn Los Angeles. Obviously, enterprise zones are not a panacea. Can they help? Yes. Can they be improved upon? Most definitely.

I have offered an amendment, the Urban Entrepreneur Opportunities Act, that I believe, along with nearly 60 cosponsors, would improve upon the fine concept of enterprise zones while recognizing the frailty of the bill. Tax incentives, capital gains tax relief, and other provisions of the bill are good, but if one cannot start the business in the urban enterprise zone, the benefits mean nothing. If you do not have the financial and administrative ability to start a business, you can never take advantage of the enterprise zone benefits.

My amendment would encourage Fortune 500 type companies to participate in the revitalization of our cities without having a facility in an enterprise zone area. The amendment would allow large companies to establish a wholly-owned subsidiary which would invest capital and offer administrative assistance to qualified aspiring entrepreneurs located in an urban enterprise zone or entrepreneurs willing to locate a business in an urban enterprise zone.

The program would start as a $250 million program administered by HUD. It would cost $85 million over a 5-year period. Large companies would benefit from this program in three ways. One, the money given to the subsidiary would be treated as a regular business expense for tax purposes.

Two, any interest received on the investments made in the small business may be used by the large company; and

Three, the large company may use the employees of the entrepreneurial business to be in compliance with Federal laws.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we need training programs. Training programs can be useful. But there is little difference between a trained unemployed person and a person who has not been trained and is unemployed, and we know the common denominator. They are both unemployed.

I believe that no urban revitalization programs can be complete without including the development of more urban entrepreneurs. We should give large companies the proper incentives to participate in the rebuilding of our cities, and Mr. Speaker, I will continue the fight to develop more urban entrepreneurs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OWENS of New York.) Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, this spring the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, which I chair, issued a staff study which showed that the Department of Justice and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC] have failed to collect court-ordered restitution. In 19 cases studied, savings and loan criminals collectively paid less than 1 cent on the dollar of their court-ordered restitution. This is unacceptable.

Today I am introducing the Financial Institution Restitution Collection Improvement Act of 1992 to remove the impediments to the collection of restitution from financial institution crooks. It is not enough to merely put these criminals in jail. We must do everything we can to seek reparations from those culprits who have stolen funds from the American taxpayers.

My legislation will make restitution collection more effective and more efficient. It provides the Justice Department, the FDIC, and the Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC] with enhanced weapons for the collection of restitution, and eliminates the confusing lines of responsibility for its collection. Finally, it allows private bounty hunters to bring collection actions on behalf of the Government, if, after 6 months, the Government has failed to act to collect restitution.

The legislation requires that restitution be due in full immediately, and a restitution order will remain enforceable until it is fully paid. Current law gives judges the discretion to order that restitution be paid over an extended period of time. This prohibits the victims of the crimes from taking immediate action to collect restitution, such as garnishing the defendant's wages or placing liens on the defendant's assets.

Another problem with currently law is that restitution orders generally cannot be enforced for a period longer than 5 years after a defendant is released from prison. Criminals should not be able to hide their assets just long enough to avoid paying their court-ordered restitution. My legislation keeps the restitution order in effect until it is paid in full.

The subcommittee's staff study found that far too often crooks hide their assets by placing them in offshore bank accounts or transferring them to relatives and business associates. For example, one defendant reviewed in the staff study transferred his $175,000 residence to his ex-wife and at least $130,000 to his children's bank accounts, free from all encumbrances. Financial institution fraud victims must be able to void these transactions and collect that which is rightfully owed to them.

The Financial Institution Restitution Collection Improvement Act gives victims of financial institution crimes greater authority to attach or place liens on stolen property and to void certain transfers of property made by financial institutions crooks. The act also allows a court to appoint a temporary receiver to administer a defendant's assets to ensure that maximum possible restitution payments are made.

To assist victims in collecting restitution, my legislation requires the U.S. Probation and Pretrial Services Office to provide victims with any financial information contained in the presentence investigation reports prepared for the courts.

Currently, these reports are only provided to the U.S. Attorneys Office and the defendant; therefore, victims are severely handicapped in locating assets for purposes of collecting restitution. My legislation would also require the U.S. Parole Commission to notify a recipient of restitution, who has not yet been fully repaid, when a defendant is to be released from prison so that the victim could keep tabs on the defendant's assets and wages.

Furthermore, under my legislation, judges would no longer be able to take into account a defendant's ability to pay in determining how much restitution he owes. A defendant should not be able to escape having to pay back that which he stole merely because he lived the good life and devoured the fruits of his crime prior to being caught. The ability to repay is not taken into account in ordinary civil litigation; it should not be a mitigating factor for criminals to evade being ordered to make restitution to their victims.

Regrettably, the Government has not made collecting restitution a high priority. To combat this problem, my legislation will enable private citizens to bring actions on behalf of the Federal banking agencies to collect any restitution which has been outstanding for more than 6 months. If successful, the amount recovered will be turned over to the banking agencies and the bounty hunters will be entitled to receive between 5 percent and 30 percent of that which they collected as well as reasonable attorney's fees and costs.

Mr. Speaker, it's pay back time. It's time for the robbers to pay back their victims. At a time when Congress is appropriating billions of dollars to pay off depositors of failed financial institutions, it is truly astonishing that defendants who have assets and income remaining have been able to pay little or no restitution. The Financial Institution Restitution Collection Improvement Act of 1992 makes sure that the victims get paid back by enabling the Government to start collecting restitution and not just convictions. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this legislation.

THE NEED TO BETTER PROTECT THE TAXPAYER FROM THE RISKS ASSOCIATED WITH GOVERNMENT-SPONSORED ENTERPRISES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call the attention of the Members of the House the action taken yesterday by the Senate which purports to better regulate two Government-sponsored enterprises, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

Together these two GSE's have issued about $1 trillion in obligations and guarantees which have the implicit backing of the U.S. Government. In the aftermath of the savings and loan disaster, Mr. GRADISON and I, along with other Members of the House from both sides of the aisle, began work to improve the capitalization and regulation of these GSE's.

Since then, there have been extensive studies by the Treasury, the GAO, and the CBO. All these studies have shown that an independent regulator and higher capital standards would better protect the taxpayer from potential GSE losses.

Yet despite these reports, and despite the continuing losses we are all paying for in the case of banks and thrifts, both the House and the Senate have approved bills which essentially ratify the status quo for Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Both Fannie and Freddie expect to meet these "new" standards before they are even implemented by the Government. There will be no noticeable change in their operations.

It is, therefore, absolutely no surprise to read in papers that these two financial institutions are the leading advocates for the legislation which is now headed for conference. Once again, it seems that we have created financial institutions which we are unable to control. But, as the recent articles from the Wall Street Journal and New York Times, which I ask permission to insert, to make abundantly clear, the foxes are still guarding the hen house well. The sad truth is, that after 3 years of work, the Treasury and the taxpayer are still left ready for the plucking.

Mr. Speaker, some progress has been made, but contrary to press releases, the GSE's—Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, et cetera—have not established proper capitalization, or allowed proper regulation to be effective.

We must continue this fight until it is done right. When it is done, then we can all issue a press release—and celebrate together. Meanwhile, GSE's: Don't mislead the public.

PRIVILEGED POSITION: FANNIE MAE EXPECTED TO ESCAPE AN ATTEMPT AT TIGHTER REGULATION

(By Kenneth H. Bacon)

WASHINGTON.—When a Capitol Hill softball team needs bases, the Federal National Mortgage Association will quickly provide a set of bags stamped with its logo: "The USA's Housing Partner."

In Congress and on Wall Street, though, Fannie Mae is better known for playing hardball. With assets of $147 billion, Fannie Mae is the nation's fourth largest financial institution. It has muscled into this position by zealously protecting government-granted privileges that enable it to borrow at low interest rates and underprice its private competition in the huge secondary market for mortgages.

Recently, those privileges have come under threat. The Bush administration and many in Congress want to tighten controls on Fannie Mae and its little brother, the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corp. (Freddie Mac). The reason: The billions in mortgage securities the two companies have issued represent a potential liability to the U.S. taxpayer of more than $800 billion, according to estimates by the Office of Management and Budget. But the profits from the two companies go to private investors.

"They have a sweet deal," says Rep. J.J. Pickle, a Texas Democrat. "The risk is 99% public and the profit is 100% private."

LOBBYING POWER

It's a sweet deal that the two institutions fight hard to protect. And so far, their impressive lobbying clout has been highly successful at fending off those who want to curb their freedom.

The Senate yesterday began consideration of a bill designed to increase the regulation of the two companies and to boost the capital they must hold to protect against failure. But the bill itself is testament to their political might. The minimum capital standards in the bill would require only modest increases in capital at either institution. And instead of creating a wholly independent regulatory authority, as recommended by various experts and watchdog agencies, the bill would leave oversight of the two institutions in the Department of Housing and Urban Development, whose regulatory efforts in the past have been lax.

"The bill perpetuates the wafer-thin captial requirements that" Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac now enjoy, says Thomas Stanton, a former Fannie Mae lawyer, whose book "A State of Risk" helped trigger efforts to tighten regulation of the companies.

A PUBLIC MISSION

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are two of six government-sponsored enterprises, or GSEs, that Congress chartered to funnel money from Wall Street into three Main Street causes—housing, agriculture and education. Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac pump money into housing markets in two ways. They either purchase mortgages and hold them in their portfolios, or they "securitize" mortgage-backed securities. These instruments, on which Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac guarantee payment of interest and principal, turn mortgages into securities that can be traded or held by pension funds, banks and other investors. The volume of mortagebacked securities has grown explosively, from about $100 billion outstanding a decade ago to $1 trillion today.

The special relationships the two institutions have with the Treasury and the Federal Reserve lead most investors to assume that the U.S. government would help them out of any problems, and Congress did bail out the Farm Credit System in 1987. This implied guarantee lowers borrowing costs an estimated third of a percentage point below what the most credit-worthy private corporations pay. (Some of that savings is passed on to the public through lower rates, while some helps ensure investors a profit.)

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac—which are publicly held—also don't have to pay state and local income taxes, and they don't have to register their securities with the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Treasury estimates these exemptions are worth $2 billion to $4 billion annually—benefits also shared by shareholders and by home buyers.

The benefits have helped the institutions to turn tidy profits. In 1991, Fannie Mae earned $1.36 billion and Freddie Mac $555 million. They have returns on equity two or three times the average for financial firms. Shares of the larger institution, Fannie Mae, have risen form as low as $2.37½ a decade ago to $57.62½ now, adjusted for stock splits.

Their financial strength has enabled Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to provide a steady stream of mortgage finance during a decade when thousands of banks and thrifts failed. Volatile interest rates and costly new regulations have made banks and thrifts less willing to hold mortgages and more eager to sell them. As a result, the residential mortgage markets are becoming increasingly federalized, with mortgage terms set by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The companies have recycled about one-third of the nearly $3 trillion residential mortgages outstanding, a proportion expected to grow.

Thus, private-sector competitors question the continuation of their privileges, especially amid the S&L bailout. "I'm surprised that these quasi-public firms have been able to maintain their access to government guarantees for free when there have been hundreds of billions of dollars spent right around them," says Bruce Paradis, an executive of Residential Funding Corp., a mortgage finance unit of General Motors Corp.

Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac both had troubles in the 1980s. Fannie Mae showed heavy losses early in the decade amid surging interest rates, and Freddie Mac bungled a big multifamily housing program. But no bailout was needed, and since then, both have boosted the capital they hold to offset potential losses, tightened underwriting standards and taken other safety steps.

Past moves to abolish the GSE's federal charters or charge them a fee for the implicit federal guarantees (similar to banks' premiums for deposit insurance) have failed. The legislation under consideration now would require Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac to file more reports, increase their capital cushions slightly and finance more inner-city lending. But with some help from their many friends in Congress, the companies have shaped the bill so it will have little initial impact.

Freddie Mac Chairman Leland Brendsel says the bill "establishes the toughest, most dynamic capital standards faced by any financial institutions." But he agrees it is "unlikely [to] cause Freddie Mac or Fannie Mae to have significantly higher capital requirements."

CAPITAL RULES

It would require them to hold capital equal to 2.5% of their assets and 0.45% of their guarantees to purchase mortgages and make payments on securities. That compares with a 5%-of-assets minimum for well-capitalized banks. G.E. Capital Corp., which operates without government benefits, maintains 11.5% capital to keep its AAA rating secure, according to public documents.

Fannie Mae Chairman James Johnson says the legislation, which has passed the House, will "remove any cloud that remains about our governmental mandate . . . and allow Fannie Mae to get on with housing Americans and making more money for its shareholders."

One reason Fannie Mae has been so successful in protecting its privileges is that it has done just what Congress created it to do in 1938: aid housing by helping lenders supply credit at the lowest rate. The institutions also say they funnel money to the lower end of the housing market. However, a 1990 Federal Reserve study of mortgage lending found that just 2.5% for the housing loans Fannie Mae bought that year were in predominately minority neighborhoods; for Freddie Mac, the figure was 3.6%

Another factor is Fannie Mae's unusual dual public-private nature as a government insider that can, for example, dispense political-action committee money. "Their intelligence is so good," says Rep. Gerald Kleczka, a Wisconsin Democrat who sits on the House Banking Committee, "that one time I was drafting an amendment, and Fannie Mae had a rebuttal in the hands of the Republicans before I spoke."

LAY OFF

SEC Chairman Richard Breeden saw how quickly Congress moves to protect its favored offspring when he endorsed a Treasury proposal to end GSEs' exemption from SEC registration. House Banking Committee Chairman Henry Gonzalez belittled the proposal as an SEC power grab. The Texas Democrat said he was only trying to protect the public interest."I'm not lobbying for powerful and rich entities like the GSEs," Mr. Gonzalez said. "They can take care of themselves."

The SEC chairman shot back: "It seems that they have, yes."

Fannie Mae has its own political action committee, called Fannie PAC, which made campaign contributions of $16,300 in the 1992 first quarter. The company also uses hired guns. In 1990, it hired former Fed Chairman Paul Volcker to help defeat a Treasury proposal for new capital standards. Then last year, it faced a House Banking Committee effort to limit executive salaries, a reaction to the $29 million retirement package Fannie granted to its former chairman, David Maxwell; it brought in Stuart Eizenstat, former President Carter's domestic policy adviser, to help work on Democrats.

"I don't think I've ever been lobbied by such a broad cross-section of influential Democrats—strategists, businessmen, everybody from the Washington hierarchy," says Rep. Joseph Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democrat who unsuccessfully pushed the pay amendment. As a result, Fannie and Freddie will continue to be able to tout their public purpose even as their chairmen earn over $1 million.

When Fannie Mae needs help with Republicans, it use the Duberstein Group, a lobbying firm headed by President Bush's former chief lobbyist. And to deal with politicians in general, it calls on powerful trade groups, most notably the Mortgage Bankers, Association, the National Association of Home Builders and the National Association of Realtors. "They have amassed an army of people to descend upon us any time they think their welfare is in jeopardy," say Rep. Kleczka of Wisconsin. Leaders of the three trade groups and Fannie and Freddie are called the "Gang of Five" in the Senate, where they have lobbied as a team.

Real-estate interests rely on the steady flow of mortgage funds Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac provide and go out of their way to protect them. Edward Kane, a professor of finance at Boston College, told a friend in a letter last year that a research project on the implications of the S&L crisis—financed by the National Association of Home Builders—was "aborted in midstream because of my unwillingness to adjust my views on Fannie Mae." He declined to be interviewed, but David Seiders, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders, says some of the trade group's leaders were upset when they learned that Mr. Kane planned to write that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac's subsidized dominance of the mortgage market weakened the S&L industry.

In the last year or so, Fannie Mae has hired the top housing staffer from the House Banking Committee and a former top aide to the secretary of the Housing and Urban Development Department, which regulates it. Herb Moses, a Fannie Mae expert on rural housing programs, is the companion of Rep Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat (who declines to vote on matters affecting the compensation of Fannie Mae officials). Both men say they go out of their way to avoid any conflicts of interest.

But the influence starts at the top. Fannie Mae Chairman Johnson has strong Democratic connections from his days as Walter Mondale's presidential campaign director. He also has close ties to Richard Darman, President Bush's budget director, with whom he worked in 1987–88 at Shearson Lehman Brothers.

In 1990, Mr. Darman used his budget message to warn of the "risk of substantial future claims against the government" from the obligations of GSEs, particularly Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Since then his worries have subsided. "The trend in his views has been consistent with the trend in Fannie Mae performance," Mr. Johnson explains, noting that after a series of losses in the early 1980s, Fannie Mae got financially stronger.

Now, it isn't losses but the rapid growth of the GSEs that generates concern. Herbert Sandler, chairman of World Savings & Loan Association in Oakland Calif., argues that "by exploiting their highly privileged position, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have rendered the business of funding home mortgages with consumer deposits and other borrowings uneconomic for many insured institutions." highly privileged position, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac have rendered the business of funding home mortgages with consumer deposits and other borrowings uneconomic for many insured institutions."

TIFF WITH SALOMON

Bank and thrift executives still shudder at how Fannie cut Salomon Brothers out of underwriting and other business in 1987 for opposing Fannie's bid to move into a new line of business in competition with Wall Street. The fight involved a mortgage backed security called Remics (Real Estate Mortgage Investment Conduits). Salomon helped create Remics and unsuccessfully fought Fannie's bid to get into the market. Now Fannie and Freddie dominate the Remic market, leaving investment banking firms with less than 10% of the business. When Fannie reduced its business with Salomon, an official said it wasn't doing this to penalize Salomon for its opposition but because "they do not give us any indication that they value our business very highly."

A group of thrifts has tried, and so far failed, to place in the emerging legislation tougher limits on expansion into new financing fields by Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The institutions help deflect such efforts by cultivating their image for financing part of the American dream. Says Mr. Johnson: "If you look at the other major domestic initiatives in the post World War II period, whether it be in health care, transportation, education or other areas of domestic policy, housing really is a dramatic success story."

Every year Fannie sends every member of Congress a report showing the amount of mortgages it purchases in each state and congressional district. In May Fannie Mae invited congressional housing experts to a Capitol Hill reception to honor innovative projects by six low-income housing groups. Four of the winners of its annual excellence awards came from states represented by members of the Senate Banking Committee. "It's their type of payoff to members," says Rep. Kleczka. "The next time legislation comes up, they'll remember Fannie."

VOTE NEAR ON REGULATION OF FANNIE AND FREDDIE

(By Keith Bradsher)

WASHINGTON, June 29.—The Senate is finally nearing a vote, expected as early as Wednesday, on a measure that for the first time would subject to independent regulation two Government-sponsored institutions that have guaranteed nearly $1 trillion worth of home mortgages.

The road to the vote has been tortuous, and not just because of the political influence of the two institutions: the Federal National Mortgage Association, also known as Fannie Mae, and the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation, better known as Freddie Mac. As often happens in the Senate, the bill has become a vehicle for largely unrelated issues.

A deal early last week has helped the bill go forward, but with two new provisions that would shield municipalities and financial institutions from environmental cleanup lawsuits. Another deal late last week makes it likely that Senate Republicans will withdraw an amendment that would require a balanced budget.

CRITICS AREN'T SATISFIED

As for the bill's main point, it satisfies Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac but does not go nearly far enough to appease their critics, who contend that the two investor-owned companies enjoy an implicit Federal guarantee on loans that could someday cost taxpayers billions of dollars if defaults soared on mortgages.

The bill would give the Department of Housing and Urban Development authority to regulate Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. The measure would also set minimum capital standards in an effort to prevent a financial setback at either institution from costing taxpayers billions of dollars.

Drafted in response to fears of a future burden on taxpayers, the bill has been so watered down that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac are in the slightly odd position of lobbying for a bill to impose regulations on them.

James A. Johnson, the chairman and chief executive of Fannie Mae, said he supported the legislation because it would insure that the two enterprises retained adequate capital to cover losses and would concentrate regulation at an agency, H.U.D., that already deals with Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Mr. Johnson said that because Fannie Mae's losses as a percentage of its assets are a tiny fraction of the losses at commercial banks, the bill appropriately set capital standards below those for banks.

"A HOBBLED REGULATOR"

Critics contend that H.U.D. is too close to either institution to be truly independent and that Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac need to retain more capital to cope with unforeseen threats, like a change in the tax-deductibility of mortgage interest. "In the end, what we've got in there is mediocre capital standards and a hobbled regulator," said Thomas H. Stanton, a former Fannie Mae lawyer who has written a book, "A State of Risk" (Harper Business, $24.95) about his former employer.

The bill began moving faster through the Senate last week after the addition of two environmental provisions.

Senator Jake Garn, the Utah Republican who is the Banking Committee's ranking minority member, had sought for several years to enact a law that would exempt lenders from having to pay environmental cleanup bills for property they acquire through foreclosures, if the environmental problems became apparent after the original loan was made. This spring he sought to attach the amendment to the Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae legislation.

But Senator Garn's move prompted a complaint from Senator Frank R. Lautenberg, Democrat of New Jersey, that the bill should also include his proposal to bar many lawsuits by polluters against municipalities. Senator Lautenberg had the ability to seek the bill's referral to the Environment and Public Works Committee's Subcommittee on Superfund, Ocean and Water Protection, although he did not do so.

BOTH PROVISIONS INCLUDED

In a classic illustration of how jurisdictional feuds among Congressional committees can shape legislation, both Senators ended up with their proposals in the bill. Senator Donald W. Reigle Jr., the Michigan Democrat who heads the Banking Committee, stepped in and mediated a settlement of the dispute last week, Senate aides said. The provisions were included in an extensive amendment that amounted to a virtual substitute bill, and the full Senate approved the "amendment" on June 23 by a vote of 52 to 44.

Environmental groups initially opposed both measures as reducing the number of groups that might be tapped to pay for cleanups. But their opposition to the municipal liability clause has faded. Douglas W. Wolf, a lawyer for the Natural Resources Defense Council, an environmental group based in New York, said: "The municipalities have a real problem. They've been unfairly victimized by large polluters."

Many companies that have dumped toxic wastes at dump sites municipalities also used for ordinary sewage sludge have tried to force towns to pay part of the toxic-waste cleanup costs.

The same groups still favor the retroactive regulation of banks that foreclose on property with environmental problems. Referring to the Gain amendment, Mr. Wolf said, "It limits the ability of the banks so far that they won't think about the environment any more."

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION MODELED ON CANADA'S SUCCESSFUL PATENTED MEDICINE PRICES REVIEW BOARD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation closely modeled on a Canadian law which has been successful in moderating prescription drug prices for Canadian consumers. The bill uses the Canadian title, "Patented Medicine Prices Review Board Act."

I hope that the introduction of this bill can lead to hearings and a debate in the United States on why U.S. pharmaceutical companies often sell their products at a lower price in Canada that they do south of the border, how Canada has been able to keep drug price inflation under the rate of general inflation, and what the drawbacks and consequences of such a plan might be.

The bill establishes a board similar to Canada's that would review drug prices. Through jawboning and publicity it may help restrain excessive price increases and profiteering. If a company failed to cooperate, the board could shorten the term of a patent which had been given to the company for a product which was being priced at an excessive level. Federal agencies which buy or are in the business of reimbursing for drugs would be advised of alternatives to excessively priced drugs. Firms which showed price moderation and gave a commitment to keep a product reasonably priced could be rewarded with limited patent life extensions. Excessive pricing would be determined by a variety of measurements, including profitability, executive compensation, the price of comparable classes of drugs, et cetera.

The U.S. pharmaceutical industry has about triple the profitability rate of U.S. companies in general, it inflates its products at about triple the general inflation rate, it sells many of its products overseas in developed countries like Canada at lower prices than it sells them to sick Americans. Many of its chief executives are the most highly paid businessmen in the world. They claim they need all this profit to reinvest in R&D, but the fact is they spend more on advertising and sales than they spend on R&D. In recent years, more new salesmen have been hired than researchers. Hundreds of millions are poured into elaborate lobbying schemes to persuade doctors to use a particular pill—millions more are spent on ad campaigns to defeat bills like this one.

The products of this industry are needed by millions of Americans to avoid serious illness and death. These are not luxury products like candy and flowers that people can stop buying. The public is held hostage to the profiteering of this industry. Other nations similar to America do not stand for this abuse of the public interest. Thus, my proposal—a modest proposal asking why we can't do as well as our Canadian cousins?

Following are some quotes and news reports that make the case for a better system in America. I hope this information can help make the American public angry enough to demand better of this industry and of the Government which has let these high technology robber barons prey upon the sick.

PROFITABILITY OF U.S. PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY: NO SENSE OF MODERATION

Consumer Reports states:

"The top 10 U.S. drug companies averaged 16 percent profit on sales in 1990, more than triple that of the average Fortune 500 company."

Similarly, Senator Pryor, chairman of the Senate Aging Committee, recently released data on the industry which showed:

"At a time when Americans are scrimping and saving to afford their medications, the drug industry's annual average 15.5 percent profit margin more than triples the 4.6 percent profit margin of the average Fortune 500 company."

"No American industry has ever defied the laws of economic gravity like pharmaceuticals. For the past 30 years the drugmakers of the Fortune 500 have enjoyed the fattest profits in big business."

From Consumer Reports, March 1992:

"Between 1980 and 1990, while general inflation was 58 percent, overall health-care costs rose 117 percent—and the cost of drugs rose 152 percent.

"High drug prices are especially a burden for elderly people, who make up 12 percent of the population but consume 34 percent of prescription drugs. Surveys by the American Association of Retired Persons have found that the single largest out-of-pocket medical expense for three out of four Americans over 65, and that four out of ten have no prescription drug insurance coverage whatever. One in seven say they have failed to take prescribed medicine because it was too expensive."

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY PRICING SOCKS IT TO AMERICANS, GIVES AWAY BARGAINS TO FOREIGNERS

From the Washington Post, May 1991:

"For the Seattle resident in need of the drug Ativan, a full vial of 1 mg tablets costs about $48. Just a three hour drive to the north, residents in Vancouver, Canada, can buy the same vial of tranquilizers for or about $7.

"On the average, drugs in the United States cost 62 percent more than they do in Canada. They also cost 54 percent more than in any country in the European Community."

From the New York Times as reported in the San Francisco Chronicle:

"A month's supply of Eldepryl, a Parkinson's disease medication from Somerset Labs, Inc., costs about $28 in Italy, $48 in Austria and $240 in the United States.

"Aerosolized pentamidine, inhaled by people with AIDS to prevent a deadly form of pneumonia, costs about $100 wholesale and about $150 retail in the United States, where it is made by Fujisawa Pharmaceutical Co., of Deer Park, Ill.

"In France, Germany and Britain, Rhone-Poulenc SA's retail price for the identical vial is $26.

" 'Obviously, we subsidize the world,' said Richard Zeckhauser, an economist at Harvard University.

"A federal study has found that state Medicaid agencies paid $474 million more for prescription drugs in 1989 than they would have if they had been bought at the prices negotiated in Canada."

ARE SPECIAL PROFITS NEEDED FOR R&D, OR IS THAT JUST A PR ARGUMENT?

From the Cox News Service:

"Dr. Schondelmeyer of Purdue says his research shows that for every dollar a drug company charges the wholesaler, nearly 21 cents recoups the cost of marketing, and 15 cents is profit. (The rest goes for producing the drug, 36 cents; distribution and administration and corporate taxes, roughly 16 cents, and research and development—stressed by the companies as a high-ticket item—only 12 cents.)

From Fortune:

"While drugmakers funnel hundreds of millions into R & D . . . they spend up to twice as much on sales and marketing. American Home Products, a superb marketer with one of the poorest records of innovation, earned a 46% return on equity last year, ranking it 16th on the Fortune 500, one notch behind Merck (with 46.5%)."

From Consumer Reports:

"The industry carefully avoids adding up its annual promotional tab, but independent sources place it conservatively around $5-billion. It must be money well spent; the pharmaceutical industry has long been the nation's most profitable."

From Chemicalweek, Aug. 7, 1991:

"There has been a ratching upward of spending on sales and marketing—"in the double digits for the past five years," says [Decision resources consultant David Godolphin]."

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY DEFIES LAWS OF ECONOMICS—THUS JUSTIFYING A PRICES REVIEW BOARD SIMILAR TO CANADA'S.

From the Cox News Service, April 1991:

"In most fields, as competition increases, prices go down. Computers, camcorders and VCRs cost hundreds of dollars less than they did when first introduced.

"But in pharmaceuticals, figures from the American Association of Retired Persons' Public Policy Institute indicate that doesn't happen.

"Look at what happened to anti-ulcer drugs. The original drug was Tagamet. After Zantac was introduced in 1983, the price of Tagemet rose 46%. After the introduction of two more "competitors" in 1986 and 1988, the price of Targamet was 64% higher than it had been in 1983.

"'Prescription drugs have been rising faster than the Consumer Price Index of all items," said Dr. Stephan Schondelmeyer, who directs the Pharmaceutical Economic Research Center at Purdue University. "Pharmaceutical manufacturers have not shown the ability to show restraint. When challenged, they become more aggressive.'"

"In this business the person who makes the buying decision is not the person who spends the money and cares most about what a drug costs. Says Dr. Jerry Avorn, an associate professor at Harvard Medical school: "Prices are high because their is a unique relationship at work. The person who pays is not the person who prescribes."

"Those earnings flow from a peculiar combination of competent research, some genuinely innovative products and many that aren't, marketing muscle, and immensely valuable patent protection. Most important, says Robert P. Bauman, CEO of SmithKline Beechman, which makes Tagamet, one of the best selling drugs in history, "it's a business that has never competed on price."

"In this market, ordinary economics seems not to apply. Since the real decision-makers—doctors—care little prices, discounting neither wins market share nor stimulates overall demand. In fact, says Ramesh Ratan, former controller at a division of Bristol-Myers, the opposite may occur. Instead of turning a market with $200 million in sales into one one with $400 million, price cutting can slash revenues in half. The upshot, says Ratan: "Price wars don't exist pharmaceuticals.'"

HEALTH CARE LIABILITY REFORM AND QUALITY OF CARE IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1992—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 102-355)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on Energy and Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit today for your immediate consideration and enactment the "Health Care Liability Reform and Quality of Care Improvement Act of 1992." Also transmitted is a section-by-section analysis.

This legislative proposal would assist in stemming the rising costs of health care caused by medical professional liability. During recent years, the costs of defensive medical practice and of litigation related to health care disputes have had a substantial impact on the affordability and availability of quality medical care. The bill attacks these very serious problems.

The bill would establish incentives for States to adopt within 3 years quality assurance measures and tort reforms. In addition, the health care reforms would apply to medical care and treatment funded through specific Federal programs pertaining to health care and employee benefits and to claims under the Federal Tort Claims Act. The tort reforms include: (1) a reasonable cap on noneconomic damages; (2) the elimination of joint and several liability for those damages; (3) prohibiting double recoveries by plaintiffs; and (4) permitting health care providers to pay damages for future costs periodically rather than in a lump sum.

Last year I recommended enactment of the "Health Care Liability Reform and Quality of Care Improvement Act of 1991." The enclosed bill includes the core provisions of that bill and expands its scope to ensure that treatment under federally funded health care and Federal employee benefit programs is subject to key reforms regardless of State action. Claims arising from such health care would first be considered through a fair system of nonbinding arbitration, in an effort to resolve the claims without litigation.

I urge the prompt and favorable consideration of this proposal, which would complement the other initiatives the Administration is undertaking regarding malpractice and quality of care.

GEORGE BUSH.

ACTIVITIES OF U.S. GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES DURING CALENDAR YEAR 1991 RELATING TO PREVENTING NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 102-354)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I have reviewed the activities of the United States Government departments and agencies during calendar year 1991 related to preventing nuclear proliferation, and I am pleased to submit my annual report pursuant to section 601(a) of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-242, 22 U.S.C. 3281(a)).

As the report demonstrates, the United States continued its efforts during 1991 to prevent the spread of nuclear explosives to additional countries, one of my highest priorities. The events of the past year in Iraq and elsewhere underline the importance of these efforts to preserving our national security, by reducing the risk of war and increasing international stability. I am determined to build on the achievements discussed in this report and to work with the Congress toward our common goal: a safer and more secure future for all humankind.

SENATE—Thursday, July 2, 1992

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 16, 1992)

The Senate met at 8:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable PAUL D. WELLSTONE, a Senator from the State of Minnesota.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God * * *.—Romans 3:23.

Almighty God, Karl Marx proposed a political system based on his belief that human nature was inherently good and religion was an opiate of the people. Our Founding Fathers built a political system based upon their view that human nature has a propensity to abuse power and introduced a government of three branches providing a system of checks and balances. Marx's system collapsed after 70 years, ours continues into its third century. In the light of present crises, financial corruption, human selfishness and greed, the lust for power, deliver us from the naivete that human nature can be trusted without God.

Faithful Father in heaven, midst the frustration and struggle of election as campaigns become increasingly negative and party lines more sharply drawn, sensitize us to the ever-present possibility that a battle could be won and the war lost. Despite our deep differences, Dear God, keep us dedicated to the profound unity that has characterized our history from the earliest difficult days of colonialism. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. BYRD).

THE DEFENSE DEPARTMENT MUST THOROUGHLY OVERHAUL THE SERVICES' ROLES AND MISSIONS

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, in 1986, after almost 4 years of work, study, and deliberation, the Congress passed landmark legislation reorganizing the Department of Defense. That landmark legislation, known as the Goldwater-Nichols Act, brought about a coordination and consolidation in the Department of Defense that had been sought 40 years earlier when President Truman stated in a message to the Congress that "* * * There is enough evidence now at hand to demonstrate beyond question the need for a unified department." Those words triggered the process that established the Department of Defense.

Those who sought unification under a new Department of Defense had to reconcile their goals with those who sought to preserve the power and influence and prerogatives of the independent military departments that preceded it. The past 40 years have been filled with evolutionary changes on the road to complete reform. The Goldwater-Nichols Act in 1986 was the most far-reaching step yet taken to create a coherent, efficient, and effective Defense Establishment.

We saw the first tangible fruits of that act in Operation Just Cause in Panama and Operation Desert Shield/Desert Storm in Southwest Asia. For the first time, the services were integrated in a way that combined the unique strengths of the individual services. As a combined force, our military capability totaled more than 100 percent of the sum of the parts contributed by each of the services. The unique contributions of the individual services were combined in an effective and innovative way to create the most capable military force in the modern era.

Gen. Norman Schwarzkopf, Commander in Chief of the U.S. Central Command, testifying before the Congress at the end of Desert Storm, summarized the importance of Goldwater-Nichols:

> Goldwater-Nichols established very, very clear lines of command authority and responsibilities over subordinate commanders, and that meant a much more effective fighting force in the gulf. The lines of authority were clear, the lines of responsibility were clear, and we just did not have any problem in that area—none whatsoever.

Secretary of Defense Richard Cheney said:

> I am personally persuaded that [Goldwater-Nichols] was the most far-reaching piece of legislation affecting the Department since the original National Security Act of 1947. * * * Clearly, it made a major contribution to our recent military successes.

Goldwater-Nichols has been a great success, in no small measure because men and women in the military implemented it with typical American determination. The Department deserves great credit for its implementation of both the spirit and the letter of the Goldwater-Nichols Act. General Powell and Secretary Cheney are especially to be congratulated for their consistent efforts to implement the Act.

ROLES AND MISSIONS OF THE SERVICES REMAINS UNFINISHED BUSINESS

But even the success of Goldwater-Nichols did not complete the process of reform. There still is considerable unfinished business at hand. One of the biggest problems we now face is an item that Goldwater-Nichols addressed in a limited way, and that is the issue of the assignment of roles and missions of the military departments.

In 1947, when the Department of Defense was formed, one of the most fiercely debated issues was the roles and missions of the services. It was not merely an issue of pride and tradition although that certainly was part of it. It was an issue of power and resources. Controlling a mission meant having a claim to budget resources. The roles and missions of the services followed the historical evolution of responsibilities and capabilities of the Army and the Navy. The Army was responsible for land operations and the Navy and Marine Corps for sea and coastline operations. But when new technologies—like combat aviation—emerged, the lines became fuzzy. A new service—the Air Force—was established, but the Navy, Marine Corps, and Army all continued to operate combat aircraft, arguing that organic capabilities were needed in order to carry out war on land or at sea. Satellites and missile technology were on the drawing boards, and the Army, Navy, and Air Force all wanted to be involved in these new technologies.

Then Secretary of Defense James Forrestal sought to resolve the dispute by convening a meeting of the service heads at Key West, FL, and in 1948, the famous Key West Agreement was reached that set out the various roles and missions of the military services.

The problem, of course, with the Key West Agreement is that it largely failed to avoid the tremendous redundancy and duplication among the military services. As former Senator Barry Goldwater frequently said, we are the only military in the world with four air forces. We have a Marine Corps and an Army with light infantry divisions. Both the Navy and the Air Force design, build, test, and field cruise missiles. Both the Navy and the Air Force build and operate satellites. Each of the military departments has its own huge infrastructure of schools, laboratories, industrial facilities, testing organizations, and training ranges. We have at least three, and in some instances four separate Chaplain Corps, Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Nursing Corps, and Legal Corps. In certain cases Navy radios cannot operate interchangeably with Army radios. Navy aircraft require different types of aerial refueling equipment than Air Force aircraft. Air Force aircraft use chaff and flares that cannot be used by the Navy. The list goes on and on and on.

Mr. President, this redundancy and duplication is costing billions of dollars every year. Let me provide just a few examples of potential savings. The Army has 18 divisions and the Marine Corps has 4 divisions. If the Defense Department decided it could eliminate just two divisions and we would save nearly $3.5 billion every year. The Air Force has 26 equivalent fighter wings, the Navy has 13, and the Marine Corps 4 wings, for a total of 43 wings. If the Defense Department decided it could eliminate just five wings of duplicative capability, we could save over $1.5 billion annually. But more important, we would eliminate the need to spend $18 to $25 billion on new aircraft over the next 15 years. The Navy operates 12 aircraft carriers. If the Defense Department decided that long-range aviation could eliminate the need for two aircraft carriers, you save $7 billion in operating costs and $9 billion required to build two new aircraft carriers. Streamlining the logistics, administration, and management duplication among the services could save tens of billions annually.

CONSIDERATION OF ROLES AND MISSIONS DURING DELIBERATION ON GOLDWATER-NICHOLS

During our deliberations on the Goldwater-Nichols legislation, former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. David Jones—who with others like Gen. Shy Meyer deserves much credit for initiating the reform process that led to the act—commented that one of the items too hard to solve as Chairman was the problem of roles and missions of the military departments. In order to get the Department to focus on the problem, we included in the Goldwater-Nichols Act a provision that requires that every 3 years, or upon request of the President or the Secretary of Defense, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff shall submit to the Secretary a report containing such recommendations for changes in the assignment of functions—or roles and missions—to the Armed Forces as the Chairman considers necessary to achieve maximum effectiveness of the Armed Forces.

On September 28, 1989, the day before his retirement, Adm. William J. Crowe. Jr., then Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, submitted to the Secretary his "Report on Roles and Functions of the Armed Forces." That report was the first such effort since the famous Key West Agreement in 1948 to address roles and functions.

Mr. President, one of the items Admiral Crowe called for was a sweeping reorganization of the intelligence organizations that support our forces. We are just now starting to see the fruits of that reorganization within the Department. This is a direct result of Admiral Crowe's initiative, but much more needs to be done in this area as well.

DEADLINE FOR NEXT REPORT IS APPROACHING

Mr. President, the triennial deadline for the Chairman's next report is approaching. General Powell has indicated that he is already working on the report. This is a tough job. It is a job no one in the Department wants. Every Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with whom I have discussed this subject has said it is singularly the most difficult problem he has had to deal with.

General Powell and the service chiefs deserve credit for the steps they have already taken. General Powell pointed out that this past year a major roles and missions issue was addressed when the Department decided to have the Army relinquish any control over nuclear weapons. This was a big change. From the earliest days of the cold war, the Army has had tactical nuclear weapons. And last year, the Department decided that the Army would relinquish the nuclear mission completely.

And as I mentioned earlier, the Department has created Joint Intelligence Centers, eliminating duplication that existed in various component commands. This will prove to be a very important step that will directly benefit our forces in the field in the future.

The Department is also undertaking a sweeping reorganization of peacetime medical care. A lead service will be assigned care in a certain region and be responsible for all medical services to all eligible personnel in that region. This is a very important step and one that could not be possible without strong leadership in the Department.

I would also note that there are examples of increasing joint and cooperative activity within the Department. The Navy and Air Force are jointly developing new types of air-to-air and air-to-ground munitions. The Joint Requirements Oversight Council process is working to foster collaboration among the services in developing new weapon systems.

Mr. President, it is clear that the Department is beginning to work to streamline operations and to consolidate programs. But there is much more that needs to be done. The actions to date are noteworthy, but not all that far reaching in terms of major roles and missions. Progress on these larger issues will require outside pressure and determined oversight by the Congress, by the President and by the Secretary of Defense and increasingly, I believe, by the American public.

THE OPPORTUNITY AND NECESSITY FOR CHANGE

Mr. President, we find ourselves at a unique point in history. We are leaving a security era that demanded large numbers of U.S. combat forces stationed overseas or operating in forward locations at high states of combat readiness in order to confront a large and numerically superior opponent. That era has ended. We are entering a security era that permits a shift in our overall strategy toward smaller force levels, with smaller overseas deployments and lower operating tempos. The exact size and organization of this future force is still taking shape. It will be a smaller force than we have today, but with certain units that are immediately available for action in a crisis, supplemented by larger reinforcing forces that can be quickly mobilized and made proficient for combat within weeks or months. We will need much more flexible weapon systems and combat organizations that can be rapidly tailored for emergencies. We will need an adaptive command structure that can quickly configure task forces utilizing the capabilities and strengths of the various service units.

At the same time our country is facing an unprecedented fiscal crisis, largely of our own making. We are drowning in a sea of red ink. We are racking up an unprecedented national debt, fueled annually by massive deficits. We must find a comprehensive solution to this problem. And certainly one element of the solution is continued prudent reductions in the defense budget.

These two factors—the reduction in the threat and the budget deficit crisis—represent the opportunity as well as the necessity of change. Now, as never before, we must address the issue of roles and missions in the Department of Defense.

The Goldwater-Nichols Act specified that the Chairman should consider three items as he reviewed roles and functions:

Changes in the nature to the threats faced by the United States;

Changes in technology that can be applied effectively to warfare; and Unnecessary duplication of effort among the Armed Forces.

Mr. President, during the past 3 years, I believe we have witnessed revolutionary developments that apply in each of these areas. The long-standing security threat that faced our country—the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact—collapsed and disintegrated. Operation Desert Storm witnessed the application in warfare of technology that has the most far-reaching implications—stealth technology, cruise missiles, precision-guided weaponry, advanced simulation and mission rehearsal, tactical ballistic missile intercepts, integration of space systems into combat operations, and so forth. While many of these new technologies had been available for some time, their application in warfare opened up new insights into how best to integrate combined forces. It also exposed continuing weaknesses in the interoperability of our forces.

And also in this same 3-year period, the Department has announced and is currently undertaking a far-reaching build-down of our military forces—closing hundreds of installations, deactivating a third of the Army's divisions, one-quarter of the Air Force's tactical fighter wings, 20 percent of the Navy's ships, and removing from deployed status nearly 70 percent of our strategic nuclear warheads. If ever there were a time for and a need for a systematic review of roles and missions, it is now.

Some time back, I was discussing this issue with Admiral Crowe. He said something I considered very important which I believe needs to be part of the public record. He said that at every point in our history as a country, when we have faced the end of a period of military crisis and the start of an era of relative peace, we deal with our defense policy in a two-step process. The first step is to cut the defense budget. And when we do that we usually get a smaller version of what we currently have. The second step is to shape a new force in light of the changed circumstances. Admiral Crowe said, that we have always tended to do the first step and failed to follow through with the second. That is why, he said, generals and admirals are usually prepared to fight the last war. It is not their fault, Admiral Crowe said, because the Defense Department only gives them a smaller version of what they had in the last war.

The services are currently in the middle of their build-down plans, and I think they are doing a good job. Some of the services are doing a better job than others. The Air Force, for example, has launched sweeping changes to its management and administrative structure. The other services are far behind the Air Force in this regard, but by and large they are doing a good job within their programs downsizing to a more realistic level. But there are virtually no major changes that cross service lines. For all practical purposes, each service is designing its own smaller future.

NEED TO RESHAPE, RECONFIGURE, AND MODERNIZE

Mr. President, we must break this historical American pattern of defense reductions. We should not go into the future with just a smaller version of our cold war force. We must prepare for a future with a fresh look at the roles and missions that characterized the past 40 years. We must reshape, reconfigure, and modernize our overall forces—not just make them smaller. We must find the best way to provide a fighting force in the future that is not bound by the constraints of the roles and missions outlined in 1948.

FRAMEWORK FOR REFORM

I do not pretend to have concrete, definitive answers to the roles and missions challenge. Certainly, there are many potential ways to streamline our operations. The framework I am going to outline is not prescriptive. It does not prescribe concrete solutions, but I hope my remarks will stimulate a constructive debate. There are 10 broad areas where there appears to be substantial duplication and potential opportunity for streamlining. Those areas are:

Projection of air power;

Contingency or expeditionary ground forces;

Theater air defenses;

Space operations;

Helicopter forces;

Intelligence;

Functional organizations and activities;

Logistics and support activities;

Administrative and management headquarters; and Guard and reserve component forces.

This list is neither exclusive nor exhaustive. There may be other, better opportunities for consolidation, realignment or further study and analysis. Some of these 10 might not turn out to be fruitful. But I am convinced it is time for General Powell to conduct a no-holds-barred, everything-on-the-table review of the current assignments of roles and missions among the military services. Here is where I would suggest they start.

PROJECTION OF AIR POWER

The first area of potential streamlining is projection of air power. Operations Desert Shield/Desert Storm provided compelling evidence of the critical role that air power plays on the modern battlefield. Tactical aircraft were among the first forces in theater to deter further advances by Iraq, provided an ongoing air defense screen over Saudi Arabia while the reinforcement proceeded, and conducted an extremely successful interdiction campaign once the war started.

But we spend tens of billions of dollars every year operating tactical aircraft squadrons in each of the four services. The services now have over 350 billion dollars' worth of new combat aircraft on the drawing boards, with only limited efforts to achieve commonality. We must find ways to save billions of dollars with streamlining and eliminating the duplication in this area.

LAND-BASED VERSUS SEA-BASED POWER PROJECTION

We have two modes of air power—land based aviation and sea-based aviation. Land-based aviation provides the mass needed for modern air combat. Sea-based aviation provides presence in areas where land basing is not possible or until it becomes possible. Both are unique capabilities and assets we require. From my point of view, the issue is not whether we have one or the other. The issue instead is choice on the margin: As we invest scarce resources in coming years, what is the most cost-effective mix of forces?

As I review the service plans and programs, I note several items that cannot be considered apart from a careful assessment of roles and missions. For example, this year's budget request contains an $800 million downpayment on a $4.8 billion aircraft carrier, and $165 million to start the development of a $60 to $80 billion new stealthy medium-range bomber to fly off aircraft carriers, the so-called AX airplane. At the same time the Air Force is proposing to start a $5 billion upgrade to the B-1 bomber.

This raises several important questions. What is the most cost-effective way to provide air interdiction in the future—with long-range bombers from the United Sates or with large numbers of aircraft carriers with medium-range bombers on their decks? What is the tradeoff between upgrading the B-1 bomber fleet and operating another aircraft carrier? What can a new AX bomber from an aircraft carrier do that our existing long-range bombers from land bases cannot do? Could Navy aircraft carriers utilize shorter range bombers—like F-18's—and let the Air Force provide the long-range bombing capability? Is the AX so important to the Navy that it will accept fewer aircraft carriers or give up the F-18E/F to get it?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Navy or the Air Force. The question is what is best for America?

I am not saying we do not need aircraft carriers or do not need long-range bombers. But I do believe that as we look to a future of shrinking budgets and changing requirements, we need to make some clear-eyed decisions about the most cost-effective mix of these forces.

DUPLICATIVE MULTIROLE FIGHTER CAPABILITY

These are other areas of duplication in air power. The Navy operates F-18 aircraft as multirole fighters and the Air Force operates F-16 aircraft as multirole fighters. The Navy wants to buy a new version of the F-18 that will cost nearly $5 billion to develop and $55 to $75 billion to procure. The Air Force wants to develop a new multirole fighter in the future to replace its current F-16 fleet. That airplane will cost tens of billions of dollars as well. During the 1960's and 1970's, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps all operated one fighter—the F-4, which was an extremely successful aircraft.

This raises several key questions: Can the services cooperate and develop a common multirole fighter? Could the Air Force use the Navy's F-18 as its multirole fighter?

The fundamental question is not which airplane is best for the Navy or for the Air Force or the Marine Corps. The question is what is best for America?

The Air Force operates some 26 equivalent wings of fighter aircraft. The Navy operates 13 wings and the Marine Corps operates 4 wings. Each wing costs hundreds of millions to operate and train annually, and billions to outfit. Obviously, each of the services would like to keep all their own wings of aircraft. But we must ask some specific questions. Do we need separate and parallel fleets of multirole fighters in the first place? How many squadrons do we need and how many should be in the Navy, in the Marine Corps, and in the Air Force? Should each of the services have a complete cross section of types of aircraft or could the services specialize?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Navy or the Air Force or the Marine Corps. The fundamental question is what is best for America?

DUPLICATION BETWEEN MARINE CORPS AND NAVY

The Marine Corps will invariably enter combat in one of two conditions: Either underneath a general Navy air defense umbrella—as was the case in Lebanon—or as part of a combined arms operation—as was the case in Desert Storm—where the Air Force and Navy jointly provide for theater air defenses. In either situation, the Marine Corps could count on the Navy or the Air Force units to provide for deep interdiction and fighter air defense. The Marine Corps also utilizes aircraft as artillery, but is there a reason why a Navy or Air Force fighter could not provide this capability?

Both the Navy and the Marine Corps operate F-18 aircraft and have separate and parallel attack squadrons. I understand that the Navy and the Marine Corps may be planning some bold actions in this area by combining Navy and Marine Corps squadrons. The Navy and Marine Corps deserve high marks for taking the lead here. But can we go further? Could the Marine Corps, for instance, specialize in vertical flight—helicopters and AV-8B's—and the Navy specialize in fixed-wing fighter support? Could Navy helicopters be transferred to the Marine Corps while Marine Corps fixed-wing fighters are transferred to the Navy? Tough questions, Mr. President, but questions that must be asked.

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Marine Corps or the Navy. The question is what is best for America?

PARALLEL ELECTRONIC JAMMER AIRCRAFT FLEETS

In another example, both the Navy and the Air Force operate standoff jammer aircraft to protect tactical fighters. The Navy's aircraft is the EA-6B, widely considered the best in the world. The Air Force jammer is the EF-111. The Navy has done a better job than has the Air Force of modernizing its jammer fleet. But ironically, even though the Navy has a better overall modernization program, budget pressure within Navy aviation is forcing them to stretch out the EA-6B program, and there have even been indications the program might even be canceled. In other words, both services are trying to maintain fleets of stand-off jammers, but budget pressure is seriously limiting their modernization programs. Could the standoff jamming mission be assigned to one service so that we have one healthy modernization program for everyone rather than two weak, struggling programs?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Air Force or the Navy. The question is what is best for America?

DUPLICATIVE INFANTRY DIVISIONS

The second major area of potential streamlining concerns contingency or expeditionary ground forces in the Army and Marine Corps. Both the Marine Corps and the Army operate light infantry divisions, although they specialize in different combat concepts and skills. Marine Corps infantry utilize amphibious assault while Army infantry units emphasize parachute assault, helicopter assault, and traditional dismounted infantry tactics. In my view, we need to retain these complementary skills.

Nonetheless, the Army has five infantry divisions in its contingency corps and the Marine Corps has three divisions. Each division costs nearly $2 billion annually in personnel and operating costs.

Obviously, both the Army and the Marine Corps will say their respective capabilities are unique. But do we need eight divisions of contingency or expeditionary forces?

The future year defense program contains over $7 billion to buy fast sealift ships largely to transport Army divisions, amphibious ships to transport Marine Corps brigades, and prepositioning ships to store the equipment and supplies of Marine Corps and Army units. The key question is: What is the right mix among fast sealift ships, prepositioned ships, and amphibious shipping to deploy, equip, supply, and sustain contingency and expeditionary forces?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Army or the Marine Corps. The question is: What is best for America?

ARMY PROVIDED TANK AND MLRS BATTALIONS FOR MARINE CORPS

During Operation Desert Storm, the Army provided tank battalions and rocket artillery support to the Marine Corps. The Marine Corps has only four tank battalions, and two of those battalions have only eight tanks each. By contrast, the Army has over 35 tank battalions, each with 54 tanks. The Marine Corps would also like to buy 42 multiple-launch rocket system [MLRS] launchers, even though the Army has over 500 and provided MLRS support during Desert Storm.

Obviously the Marine Corps would like to have its own tank and MLRS battalions. But we must ask the following key questions. Can the Army provide armor and artillery support for the Marine Corps? Can Army tank and MLRS battalions train and deploy with Marine Corps expeditionary forces, freeing the Marine Corps to invest in unique capabilities that they can provide for other services?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Marine Corps or the Army. The question is: What is best for America?

THEATER AIR DEFENSES

The third area we need to examine as we review roles and missions is theater air defenses. Air defenses have always been a divided mission. The Army operates ground-based missile systems to use against enemy aircraft while the Air Force has fighters to shoot down enemy aircraft. This distinction reflects the historical agreements reached between the Air Force and the Army back in 1948. It may also have been a plausible division of labor when we confronted a massive Soviet threat in Europe. But Desert Storm demonstrated the power of modern tactical air power. Except for Patriot missiles against Scuds, the Army didn't shoot a single air defense missile at an enemy aircraft during the war.

Certainly we cannot say that every conflict in the future will follow a pattern set during Operation Desert Storm. But the overwhelming power of our tactical aircraft does suggest we ought to fundamentally reassess air defense. The Army would like to launch a new air defense missile system, and the budget request contains over $100 million for upgrades to current systems. The Air Force is proposing to spend $14 billion to develop and $55 to $70 billion to procure a new air superiority fighter.

Clearly we need to ask the following questions. Are new air defense missile systems needed given the success of and overwhelming superiority of our tactical fighter operations? Can the entire theater air defense mission be assigned to the Air Force?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Army or for the Air Force. The question is, What is best for America?

SPACE OPERATIONS

The fourth area of potential streamlining is space operations. While the Air Force has a dominant role in space operations, it is by no means an exclusive role. The Navy operates its own fleet of satellites. The military services have parallel and potentially redundant systems on the ground for monitoring and controlling satellites and duplicative design laboratories.

If you asked the Navy they would want to keep their own labs and facilities. If you asked the Army they would want to continue to operate their own facilities and ground stations. If you ask the Air Force they would want to keep their own systems and labs. The key question is obvious: Can one of the services be assigned the space operations mission on behalf of all of the Defense Department?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Army or Navy or Air Force. The question is what is best for America?

HELICOPTER FORCES

A fifth area for potential consolidation concerns helicopter forces. Five years ago the Air Force and Army Chiefs of Staff entered into an agreement to streamline roles and missions. One of their recommendations involved transferring all helicopter operations from the Air Force to the Army. That proposed transfer was sidetracked because of opposition from the Air Force helicopter community. The Air Force continues to operate several hundred helicopters, even though the Army operates over 5,000 helicopters. Were the chiefs of staff of the Air Force and Army right 5 years ago when they first proposed this move? Now that we are facing sharp reductions in budget authority, should we not take a look at this issue again.

Again, the fundamental question is not what is best for the Army or the Air Force. The question is what is best for America?

INTELLIGENCE

As I noted earlier, the Department has made great progress in streamlining its intelligence operations in support of our unified commanders. One of the recommendations that has been implemented by General Powell has been the creation of joint intelligence centers. This reform transferred intelligence capabilities from the component headquarters—Army intelligence analysts, for example—and brought them under the direct control of the unified commanders. This had a tremendous impact on streamlining the intelligence process in Desert Storm.

Nevertheless, there are a substantial number of intelligence units and organizations throughout the services. These organizations conduct intelligence activities and provide analysis that mirrors many of the activities performed at the joint intelligence centers and at the Defense Intelligence Agency. Can we eliminate needless duplication of effort by defining better the activities that should be performed at the joint level and those that need to be performed at the service level?

In this area again the fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

FUNCTIONAL ORGANIZATIONS AND ACTIVITIES

So often the roles and missions debate focuses only on the fighting elements of the services—the tooth—and not on the support side, the so-called tail. The seventh area concerns functional organizations and activities.

PILOT TRAINING

One good example is the area of pilot training. All of the military departments operate aircraft of all variety, and each of them has their own training program and schools for pilots. While each of the services needs to have service-specific training programs for advance pilot training—carrier landings, for example—every prospective pilot has to go through preliminary stages of training called undergraduate pilot training [UPT]. Undergraduate pilot training trains basic piloting skills, determines motor coordination skills, and teaches basic principles of navigation. As evidence that this is a common requirement, the Air Force and the Navy are jointly working to develop the next generation undergraduate pilot trainer aircraft.

The obvious question is if the service can develop a common airplane to train future pilots, can they cooperate and provide on behalf of the total department and consolidate their undergraduate flight training program?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the Navy or Marine Corps or Air Force. The question is what is best for America?

HELICOPTER TRAINING

Similarly, both the Army and the Navy operate major helicopter training centers. While there is some justification for separate training activities for more advanced training techniques—such as helicopter landings at sea, nighttime assaults, and so forth—is there any reason for separate facilities for basic helicopter flight training? The Defense Department proposed to do this over 10 years ago and Congress blocked it. But the question again needs to be raised. Could basic helicopter flight training be assigned to one of the services?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. And I would say to my colleagues, as hard as it is for us, the issue is not what is best for our individual States or districts. The question is what is best for America?

AERIAL REFUELING

There are two kinds of air refueling aircraft—fast flying tankers [KC-10's and KC-135's] used to refuel jet aircraft and slow flying [KC-130's] tankers used to refuel helicopters. The Air Force operates all fast flying tankers on behalf of all the services, but the Air Force, Marine Corps, and Special Operations Forces operate KC-130's. Obviously each service will argue they need their own tankers, but is that best for the Department as a whole? Could one of the services become the operator of all KC-130's for all DOD operations, the same way the Air Force operates jet-powered tankers?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

Both the Navy and the Air Force operate duplicative long-range electronic surveillance aircraft. The Air Force operates the RC-135's and the Navy the EP-3's. Neither aircraft has a very good modernization program because the services tend to emphasize combat rather than combat support missions. The obvious key question is this: Rather than let the Air Force pursue its program and the Navy pursue its preferred alternative, could the Department determine which technical approach is superior, assign the mission to one service, and consolidate all Department funding behind the combined approach?

The fundamental question again is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

CONSOLIDATE MEDICAL CORPS, CHAPLAINS CORPS, AND LEGAL DEPARTMENTS

Each of the services has its own Medical Corps, Chaplain Corps, legal corps, and so forth. I am certain that each of the services would have valid arguments why it must have its own doctors, nurses, chaplains, and lawyers. I do not doubt that we need these professionals in each of the services. But one has to ask the larger question. Can we eliminate needless overhead by consolidating the administrative elements of the Medical Corps, the Chaplains Corps, the Nursing Corps, the Judge Advocate General Corps, and other such administrative service organizations?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

The eighth area of potential streamlining is in the area of logistics and support activities. Each of the military departments operates its own industrial facilities or depots. Each of the services operates its own test and evaluation organizations and testing ranges.

I should point out that this is one area where the Department has started to act under the Defense Management Review. There are some important steps toward streamlining underway. For example, the Department is in the process of consolidating the finance and accounting centers of the services. But far more can be and needs to be done. This is a prime area where competition among the depots would enormously improve efficiency. Competition should not be limited to depots within a service, but should be opened up across service lines and between the private and public sectors. This should be a two-way competition. The depots should be able to compete for work traditionally done by contractors and contractors compete for work traditionally done by depots. The services are starting to do that, and should be congratulated for undertaking this.

The fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

ADMINISTRATIVE AND MANAGEMENT HEADQUARTERS

Over the years the services have developed management and administrative headquarters to manage a substantially larger force than we have today or will have in the future. With the ongoing reductions in the force, the strengthening of the unified commanders, and the emphasis on joint and combined operations, there is a pressing need to examine consolidations in administrative headquarters and functions.

The Air Force has done a good job, in my view, of attempting to streamline its internal administrative structure. The Navy and the Army have been reluctant to make sweeping administrative changes. But there is an even more important issue. Perhaps functions currently carried out by the services should be performed by unified command headquarters. I would suggest the services examine the following opportunities for streamlining.

NAVY "TYPE" COMMANDS

The Navy continues to have fleet commanders for its Atlantic and Pacific Fleet commands. For example, the Commander of the Atlantic Fleet commands all the ships in the Atlantic. But the Navy also has a commander of all the submarines in the Atlantic, and a commander of all the surface ships in the Atlantic and a commander of all the aircraft. Each of these commanders has his own headquarters and large staffs. And each of these areas has their own dedicated staffs and so-called stove pipe organizations in the Navy headquarters. In an era of combined arms, do these traditional Navy communities need their own command structure in the field and their own headquarters bureaucracies in the Pentagon?

ARMY BRANCHES

Similarly, the Army is administratively organized into various branches. Some branches are warfighting branches, such as armor, infantry, and artillery. Other branches are administrative branches, such as transportation and finance. With today's integrated ground operations, does the Army continue to need so many separate branches with separate branch headquarters? The Army has three separate branches that do largely administrative work—the Quartermaster, Adjutant General, Finance branches. Could they be combined into a consolidated administrative branch? Does the Army staff continue to need 52 field operating agencies? The Army has an administrative layer of continental Army headquarters, administrative headquarters responsible for mobilizing reservists and civilians in the event of war. Are these continental Army headquarters still needed?

UNIFIED COMBATANT COMMAND HEADQUARTERS

Why are certain functions performed by separate service component headquarters not performed instead at unified combatant command headquarters? The Department has reorganized the Defense intelligence community in a way that led to a major reassignment of requirements and assets away from the service components and to the unified commands. Why cannot a similar reassignment take place with respect to elements of the operations, plans, training, and logistics functions?

The fundamental question is not what is best for the individual services. The question is what is best for America?

NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVE COMPONENT FORCES

Mr. President, the last area I would review today concerns the National Guard and Reserve component forces. For several years the Congress has been asking the Defense Department to undertake a careful and objective review of our Reserve component forces. Frankly, what we have is a mixed picture. The Air Force has the best record of the services in working closely with their Reserve component counterparts.

As a matter of principal, I believe we are entering a period where we can place a greater share of the burden on Reserve forces. Reserve component forces provide the best approach for preserving needed capabilities at lower cost. At the same time, however, I believe we must undertake a thorough review of the missions we assign to our Reserve component forces. Guard forces are unique in that they have both a national security and a domestic mission. At a time when our domestic needs are so great, how can we structure our Reserve Forces to meet both their national defense and State missions? Should we have so many of our Reserve units in large combat organizations, or should we move toward smaller units, smaller combat units that can be made more ready in a more expeditious way and in a shorter time frame? What assignments and equipment should we provide to Reserve component forces so that they are available to the Governors of the States to contribute more effectively to help address critical needs in America?

Again, the question is not what is best for the National Guard or the Reserve components or the Active Forces. The question is, What is best for America?

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, as I said earlier, I do not underestimate the difficulty of the task before us. There is no harder problem facing our military. But we find ourselves in the midst of an historic time and opportunity. At no other time in the past 40 years have we had the three primary forces for change come together—the change in our security requirements, the change in technological opportunities, and the change in budget imperatives.

In coming weeks the Committee on Armed Services will markup the Defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1993. I hope that we can initiate a process to help stimulate the kind of far-reaching review that our times demand. As I mentioned earlier, my intention is to stimulate and facilitate General Powell's and the Department's efforts in this difficult task. It is far better for the Department to accomplish this review. Failing to deal with these issues means our military capability will be diminished by needless duplication and inefficiencies.

I do not have any illusions that the categories I have discussed are exhaustive. I solicit and welcome ideas and debate to help produce the constructive and bipartisan reform that was the hallmark of Goldwater-Nichols.

I yield the floor.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I wish to commend my good friend and working partner on the Armed Services Committee.

The roles and missions issue is one we have discussed many times in the decade-plus in which I have been privileged to work with him and other members of our committee, and we have discussed this opening salvo this morning which is not fired in threat nor anger but simply fired to alert all of our desire, Senator NUNN, myself, and others to work on this important question.

I always start my set of remarks on this issue by going to the Constitution of the United States which in the preamble very clearly charges the Congress of the United States to provide for the common defense of our Nation. Article I, section 8, gives this body, together with the House—not the President, but this body together with the House—the power and authority to raise the funds necessary to maintain a Navy, and raise an Army.

I go next to what I consider as the critical framework within which any defense must be structured. That is influenced by two things. First, the threat, the threat against our security interests and those of our allies, and second, the inherent geography of our Nation. We are bordered to the north by friendly Canada, and to the south by Central and South America. But in essence we are an island Nation forever bounded by great oceans. So it is the combination of threat and geography that fashion our defense.

A third factor must be considered, and that is the economy of this country and the ability of our people to pay. Our national defense can be no stronger than the foundation on which it rests, and that foundation is first and foremost the economy, and the viability of the American people. That foundation is now beginning to crack and crumble in many areas.

This Nation and the taxpayers have borne the major burden of the defense of the world in the closing days of World War II, and now we must address their needs.

Before my distinguished chairman departs, I would like to pose a question to him, which I am sure many who will follow his remarks this morning and mine will want to know the timeframe in which he and I hope to achieve, together with our committee, our ideas on this issue.

It is my understanding that the Department of Defense requires, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs to provide the Secretary of Defense this fall—on a 3-year cycle—the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs' recommendation, that that goes to the Secretary of Defense and not to the Congress. Therefore, it seems to me that we are launching today a task that will probably take us the better part of this year and into next year, and the major impact legislatively will come with our next bill which we will work on following the receipt of the President's message in February of 1993. Am I correct?

Mr. NUNN. I agree with that. I commend my colleague from Virginia for his leadership in the Department of Defense, as Secretary of Navy and for his high, outstanding leadership in the Congress in this very area.

As I recall the Goldwater-Nichols provision that requires that annual review was very much the working of the Senator from Virginia. The report I am alluding to, General Powell's report, that will be forthcoming in September was required by the Goldwater-Nichols legislation.

I do not have any exact prescriptions in mind. I have worked with my colleague from Virginia on many of these issues. I see this as a major multiyear effort. I do not think it will be done this year, or even next year. In all probability, it will take anywhere from 2 to 5 years.

I think the time to start asking questions is now. Depending on General Powell's recommendations, I think we will have to decide how best to proceed. Should we do it here in the Congress? Should we form our own task force? Should we form some kind of commission? Should we undertake a series of hearings?—I think all of these alternatives are possibilities, and I look forward to working with my friend from Virginia as we consider them.

I think this year we should especially take a look at major new programs, programs that are in the very beginning stages of development or procurement. We must ask ourselves if these programs could be effected by the outcome of a review of role and missions. If they could be affected, we must carefully evaluate the request this year. I do not think it is time to say that they are not needed at all. I think it is time to take a careful look at the budget request, the development timetable, the amount of money being requested, and determine how far we become committed to those programs. In other words, I believe we must proceed cautiously here, understanding the challenges and fundamental changes that lie ahead. We will probably consider some changes over the next 2 or 3 weeks.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Virginia well knows, having given the better part of his career in the Senate to this subject, one thing that the Pentagon likes to have is certainty so they can plan, not only in terms of the structure and the sizing of the Armed Forces, but for the procurement associated with equipping those Armed Forces to meet the threat. It seems to me that the major part of the organizational changes which the Congress would like to see hopefully could come next year so that they can begin to restructure and then plan for the future with this revised structure.

I would not want to have this sword of Damocles hanging over its head for an indefinite period of time. Having had experience in the Pentagon myself, I know the roles and missions issue can become most divisive and destabilizing to the daily work of the men and women of the Armed Forces. Therefore, it seems to me incumbent upon us to decide what should be done hopefully within 12-month period, working with the President, and the Secretary, and the Chairman, to restructure our Armed Forces; and then go on for another period of 3 or 4 years without any major changes.

Also, since it takes a ship or an aircraft 10 years from the planning stage until delivery to the fleets and ground forces, I urge that we try to condense the timeframe as best we can.

Mr. NUNN. I say to my friend, he makes valid points. I hope that would be possible. It depends on the leadership we get from the Department of Defense, and if General Powell's report appears to the committee, to the Congress, and to the American people to be thorough, if it addresses these questions. And I do not pretend he should follow the implication of every one of my questions. There will be some of these areas that I am sure there will be convincing proof that the current arrangement is adequate. Fundamental changes will be suggested in other areas. Much depends on that report. The Constitution gives us the duties as described by the Senator from Virginia. But we must base our actions on analysis that has come from the Department of Defense itself. I say that the timeframe for action on our part depends on the leadership we get from the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, the Joint Chiefs themselves, the Secretary of Defense, and the next President. All of these individuals will be key players.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the distinguished chairman, and I will conclude with a few brief remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for another 3 to 4 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I conclude by again addressing the need for the revision of the roles and mission in comparison to what our mission has been in the world. We have clearly been the strongest military power since World War II. And it has been that strength, together with the strength of our allies, which has been the deciding factor in rolling back the threat of Communism, containing that threat in such a manner that there has been a minimum of bloodshed, as compared to the world wars when ideologies have clashed in the past. It is that strength, it is peace through strength, that doctrine which has been pursued by consecutive Presidents, that has enabled us to now see the disappearance of communism and the spread of democracy.

We have been the world leader, militarily, and now the question is: Shall we continue in this role? It is my judgment that we will continue as a leader, but let us not become the world's policeman. There is a distinction between being a leader and being a policeman. We see it today in Yugoslavia. The President, working with the United Nations, brought about sanctions, and now there is the offer for participating with U.N. forces to bring about peace in that area. We did not go in with a heavy unilateral solution. We worked with the international community. If we are to continue a leadership role, that can only be achieved by maintaining credible armed forces that can, in the eyes of the world, continue as a deterrent against conflict, as it has through these many years.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington has 10 minutes per the order.

Mr. GORTON. I thank the Chair.

MINOR CROP PROTECTION ACT OF 1992

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, during the last few years there has been a great deal of discussion and publicity about reducing the use of agricultural chemicals. This movement is rooted in the misconception that all agricultural chemicals are detrimental to our health and have harmful effects on the environment. The unfounded allegations leveled at apple growers and their use of alar in 1989 illustrates this movement. Alar, a chemical important to apple production, was unnecessarily lost to producers. In this case, as in so many others, emotion rather than science determined policy and farmers lost an important production tool.

Since the enactment of a series of amendments to the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act in 1988, farmers have been losing safe, vital chemicals for another reason: economics.

The 1988 FIFRA amendments required the Environmental Protection Agency to initiate a process to update the registrations of pesticides that had been registered before November 1, 1984. For a chemical to remain on the market, a manufacturer had to resubmit new data, often supplemented by additional testing, by 1997.

This requirement sounded reasonable until one considered the costs of performing the test needed to collect the required data. Developing and registering pesticides for crop protection is expensive. A comprehensive study that includes such information as the safety of the product, its potential effect on consumers and workers health, as well as its impact on the environment, can cost millions of dollars. The cost of residue data alone for a crop can run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

When the cost of developing this new data is measured against the potential profits from the sale of a product, some manufacturers have decided voluntarily to cancel a pesticide registration rather than seek renewal. And the farmer loses another vital production tool.

While all of agriculture is impacted by the FIFRA 1988 amendments, those producers who are hardest hit are minor crop farmers whose markets for pesticides are limited. Minor crops are fruits, vegetables, and other crops which are produced on less than 300,000 acres each year. Though these crops account for approximately 2 percent of all the acreage planted each year in this country, their collective value surpasses $35 billion. Five billion dollars' worth of minor crops are exported each year.

As important to our Nation's economy as minor crop are, they are an equally significant part of our diets. In a chart recently released by the Department of Agriculture that detailed the important food groups, fruits and vegetables—minor crops—were listed at the top. They are a major and vital part of a healthy, balanced diet.

Finally, many of the chemicals being lost have environmental benefits. Often overlooked is the fact that minor crop pesticides are critical components of many integrated pest management [IPM] systems. These programs control agricultural pests in an environmentally prudent manner. For example, phosphamidon, an insecticide used on apples, was used for the control of aphids. In addition, though, it provided the collateral benefit of controlling apple rust mite because it was not toxic to the apple rust mite's primary predator, predaceous mites. No suitable alternative to phosphamidon exists for controlling aphids and mites, and, therefore, several chemicals must be used simultaneously to render the same effect.

To ensure the continued availability of crop protection chemicals for minor use crops, the Minor Crop Farmer Coalition was organized in 1991. The coalition's efforts led to the development of the Minor Crop Protection Act of 1992, which Senators INOUYE and LUGAR are introducing today. I strongly support this legislation.

This proposal is designed to provide a number of options to the Environmental Protection Agency for registering existing pesticides and promoting new minor use registrations. The bill includes provisions for:

Waiving certain data requirements if the pesticide's use does not present an unreasonable risk to human health or the environment;

Granting extensions for developing data in certain cases;

Requiring the expedited review of applications for registration for minor uses; and

Using data from an identical or substantially similar pesticide whose registration has been allowed to lapse for economic reasons.

These mechanisms would not be permitted if the EPA determined that the pesticide in question posed an unreasonable adverse risk to human health or the environment, or where the missing data were considered essential for making such a determination.

This legislation establishes a reasonable process for reregistering minor crop pesticides that safeguards the environment and peoples' health but does not remove essential and safe pesticides from the market. It is an important first step, but more can be done. For example, increased funding for IR-4 would greatly complement this legislation.

Mr. President, like many occupations, farming looks easy until you try it. Far more goes into agricultural production than simply planting and harvesting. There are many intangibles with which a farmer must deal, weather being foremost. To the extent possible, and while continuing to guarantee the safety of the consumer and the health of the environment, Government should make farming easier. This bill does that and ensures that the environment, the consumer, and the farmer benefit. I commend Senators LUGAR and INOUYE and the Minor Crop Farmer Alliance for developing this legislation and encourage my colleagues to grant it their support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be recognized for a period not to exceed 15 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SOUTH AFRICAN TRAGEDY

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the past 2 weeks have been weeks of tragedy for the people of South Africa. In a single early morning incident, 46 people died at the hands of machete-wielding thugs. The victims were not even awake when several hundred Zula loyalists rampaged through a sleeping squatter camp. Many of the dead were women and children. All of them were defenseless civilians. All of them were unlucky to have been caught in the wrong place at the wrong time.

It was one of the worst incidents of factional fighting since the state of emergency was lifted in March 1990. In the 26 months since then, some 7,000 people have died.

But it was more than 46 individuals that died.

In a sense, hope also died.

Hope for steady progress; toward a nonracial government;

Hope for an end to the black township violence; and

Mr. President, at one time, there was great hope for reform in South Africa. The hope was kindled in September 1989, when F.W. de Klerk assumed the Presidency. De Klerk moved aggressively to distance his Government from the hard-line, racist policies of prior regimes:

ANC leader and generation-long political prisoner Nelson Mandela was freed;

The ban on the ANC and other opposition parties was lifted;

Many, but not all, political prisoners were released from jail;

Much of the legal framework of apartheid was dismantled; and

Negotiations were begun on a new, nonracial government for South Africa.

Indeed, de Klerk has spoken words that we never expected to hear from a "state President" of South Africa. And a majority of South Africans themselves have said that they stand behind de Klerk's plans for reform. White South Africans endorsed de Klerk's moves by a 2-to-1 margin in a March 17, 1992, referendum.

But that hope must now be replaced with fear, with suspicion, and with doubt.

Mr. President, it is increasingly apparent that the South African Government, the bureaucracy, the entrenched operatives of apartheid and oppression may not be reading from the same script as President de Klerk.

There is evidence that supporters of South African reform around the world, and the majority of South African voters, have much to question in the actions of South African officials.

Questions need to be asked about the Government's role in black township violence. Several years ago, ANC leader Nelson Mandela discreetly referred to a Third Force, a secret hand, manipulating events in the townships.

Mr. President, it is an open secret that the Third Force of which Mandela spoke is the South African military and police, acting through the so-called Inkatha Freedom Party.

Inkatha is the party of the Zulu nation—a people at odds with other black South Africans.

Inkatha and its leader are reported to have received substantial financial and even military support from the South African Government. Inkatha, which represents a minority of black South Africans, has opposed the African National Congress' reform efforts and its leader, Nelson Mandela. The African National Congress represents the overwhelming majority of black South Africans in talks with the white minority government on political reform.

Mr. President, I believe that more than mere ethnic differences separate the Inkatha Zulus from the ANC. I believe that Zulu Leader Chief Buthelezi thinks that he can get a better deal doing the bidding of white supremacists in the Government than if he had to run for election in a nonracial South African democracy.

This hurts the Zulu people, it hurts the majority of black South Africans, and it will ultimately hurt the white minority most of all.

It is cynical of Government officials to exploit the ANC-Inkatha division.

It goes without saying that Chief Buthelezi's willingness to be exploited in this way is downright criminal.

Mr. President, the Government-Inkatha partnership is nothing new. But this relationship has grown more ominous since the beginning of the de Klerk administration. Township violence has escalated to unheard of levels, and the violence always seems to get worse when the Government-ANC talks are at a stalemate.

Mr. President, Nelson Mandela was circumspect when he proposed the existence of a Third Force.

In a June 10, 1992, report, Amnesty International is more direct: The report documents cases in which South African security services and police have funded, armed, and directed Inkatha Zulu fighters against ANC loyalists.

Is this what good faith means to the South African Government?

Is this how the South African Government plans to move toward a nonracial democracy?

The Amnesty International report follows on last year's exposure of a secret hit squad within the South African Defense Forces.

The cryptically named civilian cooperation bureau was reported to have engaged in everything from anti-ANC organizing, to assassination. De Klerk and other top officials disclaimed knowledge of this dirty tricks unit, but its existence poisons the air around de Klerk nonetheless. The Government says that the civilian cooperation bureau is now disbanded, but one wonders if its mission has not been simply shifted to other parts of the Government.

Mr. President, the Amnesty International report is entitled "The State of Fear." It is an apt description of life in South Africa's black townships today. It describes how South African blacks have in effect been terrorized into silence.

Mr. President, how can de Klerk's reforms have any meaning when South Africans are afraid to exercise their newly found, albeit limited, freedom?

What difference does the legalizing of opposition parties make if the opposition fears for its life?

What difference does the freeing of political leaders make if average men and women are regularly hacked to death merely because they identify themselves with a political party?

What difference does the repeal of petty apartheid laws make if black men and women are afraid to leave their neighborhoods, their streets, even their homes? The net effect is that separation of the races—apartheid—remains as rigid as ever.

Mr. President, the Government-sponsored Inkatha violence may be orchestrated from on high, or it may come from recalcitrant racists at a lower level. But the actual source is irrelevant. The mere fact that a link exists between the wave of killing and the Government is all that is relevant: Its importance lies in the fact that the speeches will be meaningless, the negotiations will be meaningless, the very reforms themselves will be meaningless unless and until the fear of violence and murder hanging over a majority of South African blacks is removed.

Mr. President, President Bush lifted economic sanctions on South Africa nearly 1 year ago. In accordance with the Comprehensive Antiapartheid Act of 1986, the President certified that five conditions regarding political liberty and progress toward democracy had been met.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that section 311(a) of this act be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"COMPREHENSIVE, ANTI-APARTHEID ACT OF 1986"

TERMINATION OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS

SEC. 311. (a) This title and sections 501(c) and 504(b) shall terminate if the Government of South Africa—

(1) releases all persons persecuted for their political beliefs or detained unduly without trial and Nelson Mandela from prison;

(2) repeals the state of emergency in effect on the date of enactment of this Act and releases all detainees held under such state of emergency;

(3) urbans democratic political parties and permits the free exercise by South Africans of all races of the right to form political parties, express political opinions, and otherwise participate in the political process;

(4) repeals the Group Areas Act and the Population Registration Act and institutes no other measures with the same purposes; and

(5) agrees to enter into good faith negotiations with truly representative members of the black majority without preconditions.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, President Bush's action was predicated on a return of political disclosure to South Africa. As the Amnesty International report and numerous press investigations make clear, political disclosure in South Africa is actually beating a hasty retreat.

Where negotiation and dialog were expected, only fear and intimidation have appeared.

Mr. President, waiving sanctions is not the sum total of United States interests in South African reforms. I am concerned that the Bush administration thinks that waiving sanctions is the end of the United States role in eliminating apartheid.

Mr. President, July 10, 1992, will be 1 year since President Bush waived sanctions on South Africa. But with 1 year passed, there is little to show for this dramatic step.

I fear that President de Klerk's reforms, which met the technical, legal requirements of the Anti-Apartheid Act, have yielded nothing in reality.

I fear that United States policy is moving ahead toward full normalization of relations with South Africa, even as the South African Government's commitment to democracy slides backward.

I fear that the men, women, and children living in the squalor of apartheid will think that the United States has abandoned them in a time of crisis.

And I fear that the United States is becoming content to sit on the sidelines while the opportunity for reform in South Africa slips away.

I felt I was speaking with a man who was serious;

A man who was concerned;

A man who was committed.

I am not sure that de Klerk's word hasn't been good.

But I am sure that implementation of the announced reforms has not been good at all.

It is not enough for men and women in public life to speak well, to merely say the right things.

Public figures are judged by their actions, or by their failure to act.

In the case of South Africa today, it is clear that the actions of the ruling National Party do not live up to the words of its leader, President de Klerk.

Mr. President, F.W. de Klerk has taken some great strides. His actions gave me and many others hope for South Africa's future.

But I am frank to say that at this point in time, with the information we now have regarding Government-sponsored violence, my hope for South Africa's future is waning, replaced by a persistent, nagging fear.

In addition to other material previously noted, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Amnesty International's report, "The State of Fear," June 10, 1992, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized. He has the time from 9:30 until 10 a.m. which would be under the control of the majority leader and the Senator from Connecticut as his designee controls that time.

The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I thank the Chair.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC LEADERSHIP STRATEGY

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, just as nature abhors a vacuum, so the American economy abhors a vacuum.

For too many years there has been a vacuum of economic leadership in our country, and we are suffering from that vacuum.

Yesterday, the Senate majority leader announced a national economic leadership strategy put forth by Senate Democrats aimed at filling that vacuum in economic leadership in our country and providing a practical, results-oriented program that will create economic growth and high-wage jobs for our people.

Mr. President, the trend lines in our economy are not good. Let me just cite two indicators of those trend lines. More patents are filed here in Washington at the Patent Office today for new products by foreign companies than by American companies. And another fact: if current trends in manufacturing continue, in 1996, for the first time since Henry Ford began that assembly line, America will not be No. 1 in manufacturing output. Japan will succeed us. That is unacceptable.

This Senate Democratic economic leadership strategy is based on the two premises: One is we are not going be a great country or great economy and provide the standard of living we want for our people unless we are making things, unless we are No. 1 in manufacturing.

Second, that is not going to happen unless the Government is a partner with the private sector in taking the steps that are necessary to create economic growth in a high tech, high skilled, competitive world economy.

Mr. President, it is time for the Federal Government to act to turn around those ominous trend lines, to develop the potential that we genuinely have within our people and economy, to stimulate research and development of new technologies and new products, to make sure that Americans not only win the Nobel Prizes but commercialize those Nobel Prize winning ideas and market them successfully around the world.

We have to modernize our manufacturing process, improve work force training and promote trade. There is no way that we can be the world's leading economic power in the high tech future if we have a Government that is unwilling to help lead the way. And, unfortunately, that is exactly the kind of Government that we have had for too many years.

This national economic leadership strategy represents not only a strong program in itself, but I think a strong statement that Senate Democrats accept as our primary responsibility the reinvigoration of our economy and the protection and creation of good jobs for our people. This is a strategy that puts Government alongside the private sector, not on top of it.

It is not old-fashioned industrial policy. It is not centralized Government planning, it is not command and control from Washington, and it is not a bailout for failing industries. It is Government working as a partner with the private sector, as a catalyst for the private sector, to make sure that the strong new industries of tomorrow are being created right here in America and staffed by Americans. It is industry led and cost-shared, not Government-dominated.

This is a strategy—a blueprint, a plan. It is not the final word. It seeks to strengthen the weak links in our economy's chain of production. We will add to this framework over time as we learn from experience.

This strategy will not be in a single bill, but a series of bills. It contains a mix of new programs, programs that are being substantially revised and updated, and programs to receive major new funding.

In March we passed a tax bill with a number of important business tax incentives which the President vetoed because it attempted to pay for those incentives. We do not revisit those initiatives in this strategy, we continue to support them, but we look at the other side of the same economic coin, the role of Government in promoting programs to attack our problems.

Mr. President, I want to make it clear that while we have developed this package on the Democratic side of the aisle, and while we thank the majority leader for his leadership and encouragement in helping us to develop this project—and we are proud to have the support of the relevant committee chairmen and a broad consensus of Senate Demcorats—we hope that our colleagues on the other side of the aisle will support most if not all of these 30 programs. Some of these programs now exist but are receiving major revisions and major additional funding, others are brand new.

We want bipartisan support because the fact is that if we are going to get our economy moving again as we want to, all of us are going to have to put old ideologies aside and do what works to create jobs.

In order to get technology translated in commercial success and jobs, there are six links in the chain of production: basic research, applied research, new product commercialization, the manufacturing process, workforce training, and marketing. Every one of those links in the chain of production has to be strong if we are to compete in a global market place.

Unfortunately, today many of those links are weak. It is the aim of this national economic leadership strategy of Senate Democrats to strengthen every link in that chain.

For four decades since the United States became the dominant economic power in the world after World War II, we in this country have operated on the premise that if Government supported basic research, all the other steps in the chain of production would fall into place.

The government puts basic research into one end of the pipeline, and assumes that advanced products come out the other end. Japan and Europe are now teaching us that this approach no longer works. According to the most sophisticated economic projections completed to date, Japan will have a larger economy than the United States if current investment rates continue by 2004. This is a larger total economy, not just manufacturing. This is not just Japan recovering from World War II, that was a half century ago. This is a new economic model that we have to respond to if we are going to keep our standard of living.

In this new strategy we are trying to address these problems comprehensively, not just piecemeal, bill by bill, committee by committee. We are trying as a majority within this Chamber to look at our economic growth problems as a whole, I believe for the first time. We are looking at each link of the production chain.

While we still lead the world in basic research, we are falling down in applied research—research that leads to new products. The National Science Foundation reported earlier this year that spending by U.S. industries on R&D peaked in 1989 at $79 billion and has dropped in both 1990 and 1991. At the same time our foreign rivals were increasing R&D at a brisk pace.

We are also falling behind in the manufacturing process itself. The problems our auto industry is having keeping up with Japanese advances in quality production is the most obvious symptom of this problem. Unless you manufacture the best product and get it to the market first, you lose the business competition. Productivity growth is a good measure—while our productivity rate improved in the 1980's it is still well behind Japan's. And on the critical factor of investment in plant and equipment, Japan is spending over 20 percent of its GNP on investment and we are spending less than 10 percent. We are being beaten by more than two to one in this crucial category. In the long run, that low investment rate spells disaster for our country.

We need breakthroughs in areas that are a bit arcane but are very critical to our success. The manufacturing process is one of them. Japan, for example, has some 170 teaching factories that consist of the most advanced factory floors it can finance. Each of these is staffed by highly trained manufacturing engineers, who train employees of participating companies on the latest equipment and approaches. They bring workers and managers in to train on those floors. And firms can use these factory floors for actual production—the ultimate in production and efficiency training. To match this we have five manufacturing extension programs now in place, not full factory floors geared to production specialties in each region. I note in contrast that we do have agricultural extension programs in virtually every county with farms in this country.

And we have workforce problems—U.S. educational performance, particularly before 12th grade, is inadequate by every international standard. That translates into a workforce training problem.

These all translate into problems in getting our products commercialized.

Finally, we have problems in the marketing side, in getting our exports promoted abroad. Exports are now crucial to our economy: trade was 10 percent of our GNP in 1960, it is 25 percent of our economy today. That means many, many jobs for Americans. Yet while we had a 22 percent share of OECD country exports in 1960 we have less than 15 percent today. We are going to have to do a better job of promoting our exports abroad.

Mr. President, the package our committee have assembled tries to address each of these issues.

First, our strategy provides support for applies research—the development part of R&D. Under it, nondefense and dual-use development at government, industry, and university labs and development centers will be significantly expanded. And the Federal Government will identify and support emerging critical technologies and will invest in new technological infrastructure.

Second, the plan will help both large and small firms turn new technologies in commercial products. We have new capital financing mechanisms and build up existing ones.

Third, we look at the manufacturing process, promoting programs to improve it and promote manufacturing innovation. We also expand the existing manufacturing extension programs so that new production techniques get out to U.S. small and mid-sized businesses.

Fourth, we attack the problem of workforce training by creating a new apprenticeship program, national education standards and assessments, and increasing government support for manufacturing engineering education.

Fifth, we expand Eximbank programs, require much greater coordination among the 16 agencies now undertaking export promotion and support more rational export control systems.

Our priorities are: improving product development; improving product commercialization; improving the manufacturing process; improving workforce training, and improving trade promotion.

This is a realistic package—it represents what the committees can get passed now, before the end of the year and early next. We will seek to fund these programs as a priority within existing domestic priorities.

I want to thank the majority leader and his staff, particularly Lisa Nolan and John Hilley, for their leadership putting this effort together. I also want to note the other Senators most active in this initiative, including Senators ROCKEFELLER, BINGAMAN, GORE, BAUCUS, BUMPERS, JOHN KERRY, ROBB, WOFFORD, GRAHAM, and MIKULSKI. We are all very grateful respectively to William Reinch, Tamera Stanton, Edward McGaffigan, Greg Simon, Tom Sliter, Chuck Ludlum, Scott Bunton, Julius Hobson, Linda McIntyre, Dan Solomon, Leslie Woolley, Steve Ganote, and Peter Saundry of their staffs, for their efforts. We are also very grateful to Chairmen HOLLINGS, RIEGEL, and SASSER, and to Patrick Windham, Michael Nelson, Ken Jarboe, Terry Hartle, and Chuck Marr of their committee staffs. We are all very appreciative of the dedicated work of Garth Neuffer, Monica Healey, and Chris Balderston of the Democratic Policy Committee. We thank, too, Senator PRYOR, and Desten Broach and Kirk Robertson of his staff, who worked so hard on defense conversion proposals announced last month, for their close cooperation. Finally, I want to thank William Bonvillian, William Danvers, and Kenneth Glueck of my office.

Mr. President, this program grows out of conversations that all of us have had, with trade associations with workers, with business leaders—of businesses large and small. This is a program that comes up from the grassroots. I think we could take this program into every Chamber of Commerce and every union hall in America, describe it, and gain strong support.

Today, we present it to our colleagues here in the Senate. We ask for their support. We hope for the support of the President. We know we will have the support of the American people.

We hope this program not only engenders support here in this country but creates a little nervousness among the leaders of our friends in Japan and Europe, our economic competitors in the world today. Perhaps they will see in this program that the United States is finally coming together, one solid team, ready to meet our competition on the world's economic battlefields headon. And perhaps it can help show us how to win the victories, the business, and the jobs that we desperately need to assure our standard of living into the future.

I ask unanimous consent that a detailed description of the legislative provisions in this economic leadership strategy appear in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Legislative Provisions in National Economic Leadership Strategy

I. KEEPING U.S. ON CUTTING EDGE OF HIGH-TECHNOLOGY AND APPLIED RESEARCH

NIST Advanced Technology Program (ATP): This initiative would increase funding for the ATP, which provides matching funds to industry-led efforts to develop new basic technologies in such fields as electronics, advanced manufacturing, materials, and bioprocessing. (Commerce)

NIST Laboratory Research and Services: This initiative would increase funding for National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) laboratory programs, which provide industry with the precise measurement and quality assurance techniques necessary to speed the commercialization of new technologies and improve manufacturing quality. (Commerce)

DARPA "Dual-Use" Technology Partnerships with Industry: The proposal would increase funding for this DARPA program, which develops new technologies with industry cooperation, and is directed to advanced and critical technologies. Costs are shared with industry, and the program is coordinated with the Department of Commerce's advanced technology program and the Department of Energy's technology partnership program. (Armed Services)

High Performance Computing and Communications (HPCC): The purpose of HPCC (which is proposed for expansion) is to strengthen U.S. technological leadership in high performance computing and computer communications. The core program focuses on improving computers and networks for federally-funded researchers. The proposed new trial applications program would support industry-led efforts to apply HPCC technologies in a wider range of areas, including education, computer data bases and libraries, health care, and manufacturing. (Commerce)

Federal Labs Initiative: The Industry-Laboratory Partnership Program would reorient many federal labs to help American commercial industry. Under the initiative, a percentage of each agencies laboratory budget would be set aside to support industry-led, cost-shared R&D projects with that agencies laboratories. Agencies would set up industry-university advisory committees, and a study would be conducted on the resources and capabilities of the Federal laboratories to analyze what might be most useful to industry. Funding would flow from existing sources, so no additional appropriations would be necessary. (Commerce)

National Science Foundation (NSF) Assistance to Universities: Strengthen America's university research capability by doubling the budget over five years for NSF's research budget, and significantly increasing assistance to universities to renovate research facilities. This would ensure that universities can continue performing cutting-edge scientific research. (Labor & Commerce)

Critical Technologies Institute: Continuation of this initiative would provide staff and technical resources to the Executive Office of the President, particularly the Office of Science and Technology Policy. Particularly intended to help the Executive Office prepare strategies for the critical technologies identified in the biennial critical technologies report. (Commerce)

II. CREATING QUALITY JOBS BY PROMOTING INCREASED COMMERCIALIZATION OF PRODUCTS

A. Promoting increased commercialization of new products

Small Business Innovation and Research Act Reauthorization. This legislation would reauthorize and substantially expand the Small Business Innovation and Research Program (SBIR) to promote development of commercial products from basis and applied Federal research. SBIR provides grants to small firms for research and product development. All agencies with extramural R&D budgets in excess of $100 million must set aside 1.25 percent for the SBIR program. The reauthorization would double the required set-aside, but not increase total appropriations. (Small Business)

Additional Support for Commercializing Critical Technologies. Three proposals now before the Commerce Committee would provide additional support to help industry develop and commercialize new advanced technologies. These proposals, which would include establishment of a Civilian Technology Corporation and an Advanced Technologies Capital Consortium, would provide loans, loan guarantees, and equity investments as well as grants. Legislation which emerges from the Commerce Committee is likely to be a synthesis of these three proposals. (Commerce)

Small Business Investment Company Act (SBIC). This bill would restructure the existing venture capital program which provides financing and management assistance to small entrepreneurial businesses. The restructured program would improve program delivery and correct structural deficiencies. SBIC has provided start-up financing for many successful ventures, including Nike and Federal Express. As the restructuring would not require additional funding, the initiative assumes current services funding. (Small Business)

Housing reauthorization; The Housing reauthorization bill will include some new economic development initiatives. One of these will be reforms to the Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) program. Currently, a number of provisions limit the usefulness of CDBG funds for business and economic development. This initiative will also include a micro-business pilot program to set-aside CDBG funds for loans through community development organizations to small businesses. This would meet the needs of small business for loans below $25,000, which is the level of an SBA loan. (Banking)

Regional Technology Alliance (Critical Technology Application Centers) program: This program (also authorized without appropriations) would foster regional infrastructure, in particular critical technology areas in coordination with the Commerce department. While the Manufacturing Extension program would be geared to manufacturing innovation and processes, this program would be directed to extension efforts for critical technologies. Funding would go to regional centers, providing services, information, and products to support critical technology development. Costs would be shared by industry and states. (Armed Services)

Other Technology Initiatives: The Commerce Committee also will consider other technology initiatives during 1992, including the Technology Transfer Improvements Act (which has already been reported by the Committee), and a yet to be introduced bill that would encourage industry efforts to develop environmentally-sound product and process technologies. The Committee will also strengthen and authorize increased funding for NASA's R&D programs to develop technologies key to the success of U.S. civilian aviation and space industries. (Commerce)

Strategic Environmental R&D Program: In addition to expanding DoD's role in global environmental change research, this legislation would require the development of new clean-up technology by DoD and DoE, in coordination with EPA. It would be relevant to both DoD's major environmental clean-up problems and to the growing environmental clean-up industry. (Armed Services)

B. Supporting development of new manufacturing technology and extension

SEMATECH (DARPA funded): This program—proposed for continuation at current funding levels—is designed to develop semiconductor manufacturing technology advances led by industry. Program costs are shared with industry. (Armed Services)

Additional Manufacturing Activities: This would provide support through new and existing NIST and NSF programs to help industry develop and deploy the next generation of computer-integrated, electronically-linked factories. The goal is to ensure that the U.S. does not fall behind other countries in 21st century manufacturing. The NIST portions of this initiative are contained in S. 1330, the proposed Manufacturing strategy Act. (Commerce)

Other MANTECH: These programs—for which a modest increase in proposed—develop advanced manufacturing technology for defense industries in cooperation with those industries. Some of these developments are also relevant to civilian R&D needs. (Armed Services)

NIST Technology Extension Services: Increase support for states to assist small manufacturers through two Commerce Department (NIST) programs—the Manufacturing Technology Centers Program and the State Technology Extension Program. These programs help states provide assistance to the nation's 350,000 small firms to modernize manufacturing equipment, adopt new manufacturing practices that boost quality, productivity and profits, and help improve the skills of workers. (Commerce)

Manufacturing Extension program: This program (which has been authorized but has yet to receive appropriated funds) would support existing state and local efforts, and is directed at bringing technology advances to defense and commercial small and medium-sized businesses. The extension program would work in coordination with Commerce programs, such as NIST Hollings centers). (Armed Services)

Defense Production Act reauthorization: The Defense Production Act (DPA) provides the authority needed for the maintenance and mobilization of the defense industrial base. It authorizes the use of purchase guarantees, loan guarantees and loans in order to maintain or expand the domestic defense industrial base and to foster new industries or technological capabilities needed to maintain national security. This bill—currently in conference—reauthorizes the existing programs and creates new programs to strengthen the defense industrial base. These include a domestic preference for critical defense technologies and components, and increased incentives for modernization by defense suppliers, especially at the sub-tier level. (Banking)

III. IMPROVING EDUCATION AND JOB-TRAINING TO ENSURE HIGHLY SKILLED U.S. WORKFORCE

School to Work Transition: The High Skills, Competitive Work Force Act of 1991 would expand opportunities for high-quality education and training for the millions of students who do not enroll in higher education after high school. The legislation would authorize career preparation programs, youth opportunity centers, and a voluntary national system of industry-based occupational training standards and assessment and certification procedures. (Labor)

Manufacturing Engineering Education program: The initiative would increase funding for this program, which improves graduate and undergraduate manufacturing engineering education, and increases its relevance to industrial needs. Costs are shared by industry, states and local educational institutions; the program is coordinated with NSF science and engineering education programs. (Armed Services)

Educational Research and Statistics: The federal government play a major role in supporting educational research. This reauthorization will include: (1) an effort to establish voluntary, national education standards by establishing the National Education Standards and Assessment Council, (2) expanding the collection of state level data on educational achievement, and (3) expanding the use of technology in education. (Labor)

Job Training and Basic Skills Act: This legislation would revise the Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) to provide improved job training and education services to those economically disadvantaged individuals most in need of services. The bill would (1) change eligibility rules to target those persons facing serious and multiple employment barriers, (2) revise JTPA's focus on placement and cost outcomes by increasing the emphasis on educational and workplace competencies and long-term job retention; and (3) strengthen the capacity of the JTPA system to serve youth at risk of chronic unemployment. (Labor)

IV. STRENGTHENING TRADE TOOLS TO OPEN MARKETS AND PROMOTE U.S. PRODUCTS ABROAD

A. Promoting U.S. products abroad

Export-Import Bank (Exim) reauthorization: The Exim bank is the main government agency for the financing of U.S. exports, through direct loans and loan guarantees. This bill would reauthorize these programs and make changes to improve the operation of Exim bank, including authorization for 100 percent coverage of loan guarantees. The bill would also reauthorize and strengthen the tied-aid "war chest," which is used to counter attempts by other nations to offer cut-rate financing for development construction projects tied to purchases of goods and services from the nation offering the financing. (Banking)

Coordination of Export Promotion Activities: The Exim bank bill also includes an initiative to strengthen export promotion coordination now in 16 different agencies by creating a statutory Trade Policy Coordinating Committee that will promote cooperation between the agencies and recommend resource allocations. (Banking)

Export Administration Act: This bill, which is now in conference, reforms and updates export controls to permit greater sales of U.S. high technology goods abroad while maintaining national security. The bill also reauthorizes the export promotion activities of the Commerce Department, including the U.S. and Foreign Commercial Service, and strengthens those activities. It also reauthorizes the interest rate subsidy program of the Exim bank. (Banking)

B. Strengthening Government's role in opening markets

Trade Agreements Compliance Act: This bill would allow interested private sector parties to petition the U.S. Trade Representative to review foreign compliance with a trade agreement under section 301. If there is a violation, USTR would have 180 days to negotiate with the trading partner to address the violation before imposing trade retaliation. (Finance)

Fair Trade in Financial Service: This bill (now in conference) would strengthen the ability of the U.S. to retaliate against closed foreign markets in financial services, which is especially a problem for banks, stock brokers, mutual funds and other providers of U.S. financial service in Japan. The purpose of the bill is to open up markets using the same leverage that was used to open up the Japanese government securities market to U.S. brokers as part of the 1988 Trade Act. (Banking)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I yield to my colleague from Michigan such time as he requires.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I underscore the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut and thank him for his leadership. This is an excellent package.

The component parts fall under the jurisdiction of several committees, a number of them under the jurisdiction of the Senate Banking Committee. We have already acted on those items. They have either been reported out of the committee and are awaiting floor action or have in fact also passed the Senate during conference with the House. So we are moving on this strategy, and it is an essential economic growth strategy and economic surge strategy for the country.

Why is this so urgent? Let me read an item just off the national wire service. The unemployment data just came out this morning.

> The Nation's unemployment rate surged to 7.8 percent in June, the highest level in more than 8 years, as the weak economy proved unable to absorb an influx of job seekers, the Government said today.

They indicate in this data, with this sharp jump in unemployment, we now have 10 million people in the United States that we know by name who are unemployed, need work and cannot find it. There are several million more who fall under the category of discouraged workers who have given up looking and millions more who are in a circumstance where they are working part time because they cannot find full-time work.

We have a major problem on our hands and the administration shows, literally, no understanding or awareness of this problem, no sense of urgency.

The numbers have gone up. The unemployment numbers have gone up all across the country. California has the highest rate, 9.5 percent. My own home State of Michigan now, 8.8 percent. We have 404,000 people in the State of Michigan unemployed as of the time of this data that is just out this morning.

Not surprisingly, there is another urgent item on the wire this morning. Finally the Federal Reserve has slashed the key discount rate from 3.5 to 3 percent. Where has the Fed been up until now? This problem has been building up now well over a year's length of time. This is one of the longest recessions we have had in our history. This data should not come as any great mystery or any great surprise. The story has been coming in from all across the country, from unemployed workers, from companies shedding employees. Hughes announced a day ago, they're laying off 9,000 workers—I mean eliminating that number of jobs. Aetna—4,800 jobs being eliminated; Alcoa is getting rid of 2,100 jobs. That is just within a 1-day period of time. We have a serious job emergency in this country and there is no recognition of it by the administration.

Some of it involves long-term problems dealt with in part by the plan we are laying out today. But some of it is a failure to respond in a more immediate way to the problem that is right in front of us.

So, yes, it is appropriate the Fed act today. But the Fed has been a day late and a dollar short all the way through this problem and that is why this problem is so much worse today.

Why is it after already having two down periods during this recession we now have the highest unemployment that we have had in this country in all these years? In 8 years, the highest unemployment, right now, that we have had over a 8-year period of time. That is why there is a need for new leadership in this country and why there is a political rebellion under way in America today, because of the sickness in the American economy and the Bush administration attempting to say either there is no problem or, to the extent there is a minor problem, if we are just patient the problem will solve itself. It will not solve itself.

One element of this plan has to do with trade. Something the President can do to help unemployed workers in this country today involves the conversations he is involved with right now with the Prime Minister of Japan.

Japan last year had a trade surplus with the United States of $43 billion, and it is outrageous. It means they took $43 billion of scarce capital and jobs out of this country and took them to Japan. That is one of the reasons why unemployment is so pervasive in this country today. They are the worst offenders in international trade and every other nation has stood up to Japan in this area except the United States.

The European Common Market has stood up to Japan, told them to put an end to the trade cheating. We have not done that here because our administration has been unwilling to confront the problem. We need to open the Japanese market and we need to put a stop to the dumping practices and the keiretsu practices that have been documented in case after case after case with respect to Japanese trading activity here in the United States, because they are stealing jobs from our country by virtue of this trade cheating. And the President has to wake up to this problem and confront the Prime Minister of Japan and say this has to stop; we cannot continue to see unemployment go on up in this country in part because of the trade cheating by someone who calls himself an international friend of the United States.

Since 1980, Japan has taken out of the United States in trade surpluses in their favor $460 billion. Over that same period of time, since 1980, the Bush-Reagan policies that have hurt this country so much, the economic policies, have given us a cumulative trade deficit with the rest of the world of $1.1 trillion.

And people in this country are not stupid. They understand what is going on. We see it in the steel industry. All the steel companies in the United States just went together 2 days ago to file a massive legal suit against the trade cheating, and they have outlined all the countries around the world.

One of the worst of the offenders is Japan. In 1980, we had 500,000 workers in America working in the steel industry. Last year, that dwindled down now to 150,000. What has happened to those men and women who worked in those jobs? Many of them have not been able to find replacement jobs.

Our own office in the U.S. Trade Representative has put out a book. They put it out each year. It is called the "National Trade Estimate—Foreign Trade Barriers." Look at the size of this. It looks like a phone book for a large-size city. In here, on Japan alone, there are 18 pages of illustrations of trade cheating by Japan that is stealing jobs in America. These things are connected.

Our plan today addresses in part the issue of getting trade fairness. We have a lot of products that we can sell overseas if other countries will allow us to do it. Yes, we have to work harder within our own country, and we lay out ways in which that is to be accomplished. But you can have the best product in the world at the lowest price, and if you are dealing with a country that will not let your goods in, then you are not going to sell in those countries.

We had a situation at a trade fair last year in Japan where we had American rice on the table. It so offended the Japanese because the quality was better and the price was better that they came in and literally arrested the bags of rice, and made the bags of American rice leave the trade show because it was so offensive to the Japanese rice interests.

That is part of the problem here. We have a much more serious problem today with this trade cheating than we have in some of these other kinds of international situations that get all the attention. And it is draining the economic strength out of America; it is draining jobs out of America.

Now, the Fed has acted in an emergency way because we have an emergency; we have a job emergency in America, and it is not right. I am tired of all the concentration on foreign policy and no concentration on a policy for America.

The President is here now trying to help the Japanese. They have a bill on the floor right today to help the former Soviet Union. They have a proposed free-trade agreement with Mexico that is going to provide jobs for Mexico. But there is no plan for America, even though the unemployment rate today has hit an 8-year high in our country. We have 10 million unemployed workers. They are desperate for work, and they deserve the top priority and the consideration of this Government.

So it is time for the Fed to wake up and stay awake. And more important, it is time for this President to lead on the issue of greatest urgency of this country, and that is our economic future. We are losing our economic future. We are losing it every single day. We are not keeping faith with the people of this country.

Kids are coming out of college today who worked and sacrificed—and their families sacrificed. They are coming out of college, prepared to work and cannot find work. That is not right. The fact that the sons and daughters of the people in the Cabinet and the top positions of this Government are finding work does not mean a thing, except to point up the contradiction, when other people in society who do not have those kinds of favored connections are coming out and cannot find work.

So we need a plan. We have put a plan on the table here today. And we need an aggressive turn of attention of our country away from this preoccupation on foreign policy to get down to the question of what needs to be done in America. That is why there has been such a tremendous loss of faith in our country. We have not a minute to lose.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators will be speaking on time controlled by the Senator from Connecticut.

The Senator from Montana seeks recognition under that time management.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, in effect, could the time controlled by the Senator from Connecticut be delegated? He is not here at the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator from Montana is recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until 10 a.m.

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. GORE. Reserving the right to object, and I, of course, shall not object, but I wonder, did the Presiding Officer say the time for speaking runs out at 10 a.m.?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time controlled by the Senator from Connecticut as the designee of the majority leader expires at 10 a.m.

I am sorry. Morning business will continue until 10:30, with Senators permitted to speak for 5 minutes therein.

The Senator from Montana is recognized.

ECONOMIC GROWTH STRATEGY

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I rise to strongly endorse the plan, the package that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. RIEGLE] spoke to very passionately and effectively, as well as the plan referred to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LIEBERMAN], and Senator MITCHELL.

This is a package of economic growth measures which we Democrats are unveiling today, and also at a press conference on our package yesterday. We think it is very important to work together to develop a package of economic growth initiatives so that American workers begin to have more faith and more confidence in the American economy and more confidence in Government.

In recent years, we have come to recognize that national security has an economic as well as a military component. Our victories in the cold war, and more recently in the gulf war, prove beyond question our ability as Americans to promote U.S. national security interests through military means.

We now have to focus much more on our economic interests. We are the world's unquestioned military superpower. But our record for promoting national security in the economic arena is much more in question.

Behind the impenetrable military shield of the U.S. Armed Forces, the American economy shows definite signs of rust and decay. Just consider a few statistics.

The wages of the bottom four-fifths of the American work force have been stagnant for more than a decade. That is, their incomes have not been rising in real terms; they have been falling. That is the bottom four-fifths; that is for almost all Americans but for the top one-fifth.

In recent surveys in developed countries—that is, America and all the other developed countries—American students finished last in mathematics and second-to-last in science. That is among all industrialized countries.

The United States has run a trade deficit every year for more than a decade. That is, we are buying a lot more goods overseas than we are selling overseas, and recent figures indicate that that deficit is again on the rise. Japan is expected to pass the United States to become the world's largest manufacturer. That is with only half of the American population.

Again, Japan is about to become the world's largest manufacturer; that is, manufacturer of more products than any other country in the world, with a population one-half that of the United States. Clearly, it is time for us Americans to turn our attention from repelling foreign enemies in the military sense to arresting and reversing the decay of our economy.

I am pleased today to join with Senator MITCHELL and a group of Senators in presenting an ambitious package of economic growth incentives. The package first endorses long overdue measures to strengthen America's technology base, including forging a new mission for America's national labs, bolstering research at American universities, and increasing the focus on applied R&D to bring new products and techniques on line more quickly so we are manufacturing those products much more in America.

Second, the initiative endorses a number of measures to commercialize new technologies by harnessing the innovative abilities of small business and the institutional resources of the Department of Defense.

Third, the package promotes education and job training. It increases our commitment to vocational education for non-college-bound students. It also endorses basic minimum standards for students to ensure that all students get the education they need to function in the 21st century.

Finally, the package endorses an aggressive initiative to secure new markets for American products abroad, a subject that was just addressed by the prior speaker, Senator RIEGLE. This includes a new emphasis on funding and organizing America's trade promotion efforts.

As chairman of the Finance Subcommittee on International Trade, I am pleased the package includes strong provisions to open foreign markets. The package calls for the reauthorization of our toughest market-opening tool, Super 301.

Super 301 was included in the 1988 Trade and Competitiveness Act. It compiled a very impressive record, opening markets in Japan, Brazil, Korea, Taiwan, and other countries in 1989 and 1990. But the Bush administration has opposed its extension. That provision has expired; it is no longer in effect. We want to extend Super 301; we want to bring it back.

The package also calls for the enactment of the Trade Agreement Compliance Act. The Compliance Act is based on the simple principle that a deal is a deal. It creates a special procedure for ensuring that the United States vigorously enforces its rights under existing trade agreements. It sends a strong message to our trading partners that we will not tolerate violation of trade agreements.

Finally, we call for enactment of tough trade provisions to open foreign financial services markets.

The United States has used tough tools to open foreign markets for American goods. We need similar tools to open foreign markets for American financial services.

There is a simple message behind all these provisions. If our trading partners expect continued access to our markets, they must open their markets. Simply put, trade must be a two-way street.

America has the most open market in the world. We do not want to close it. Rather, we want to open foreign markets so that all countries can enjoy the benefits of free trade. I am pleased to say that action is already under way on a number of these initiatives. On trade issues, the House is already moving a trade bill that includes all the trade elements I have just described. Final action is scheduled in a matter of a couple of weeks. In the Senate I am hopeful a bill can be introduced and enacted upon this summer and a final measure could be sent to the President for signature this fall.

The measures I have described are critical to America's economic security. They are critical to America's national security. It is my hope we can defy the conventional wisdom and enact these changes even in an election year.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, yesterday's announcement of a national economic leadership strategy represents an important step forward in the national competitiveness debate. The argument over whether we have a problem is finished. The only people who do not think we have one are working in the White House. The national economic leadership strategy begins the debate over solutions.

I am proud to have joined the majority leader and so many other Democrats in the Senate, in presenting this strategy. It represents the ideas and serious thinking of all of the participants who share a commitment to putting our country on a path of economic growth. I hope it will build momentum for enacting the legislation needed to fulfill our common goals.

Whether you believe that U.S. productivity, growth manufacturing, and technological innovation are deteriorating, or that other nations are simply moving faster than we are and catching up, we have a serious competitiveness problem by virtually any measurement one uses. Unless we act quickly to rebuild our manufacturing base and the high quality jogs that go with it, our children will be the first generation in our history to have a lower standard of living than their parents.

That matters because we are stewards for their future. It also matters because the end of the cold war means that economic power will define global leadership in the future. Our ability to continue to play the lead on the world's stage will depend on our economic strength. I believe in American leadership. The world is a freer and better place because of it. But if we want it to continue, we must get our economic house in order.

This national economic leadership strategy starts us down the right road in two important ways.

First, it is comprehensive. By bringing together a wide range of proposals, some new, some already making their way through the legislative process, we create a blueprint for bringing our technology and manufacturing base up to world class standards, and for creating a well-educated and skilled work force.

Second, our strategy is based on government leadership. A telling moment for me came when I read Fortune's December issue, which contained interviews with various CEO's on America's future. CEO after CEO called on the government to lead—to determine what our national priorities are and to mobilize government resources to achieve them.

George Bush's response in the interview stood in sharp contrast. His vision was for companies to do what they do best. His goal was to get out of their way. And that sums up the differences between us. Democrats believe the Government has a leadership role in building the infrastructure and technology base that will determine the American economy of the future. We agree with business leaders who want to build the partnerships and lay the plans for a prosperous, competitive economic future.

There is ample precedent for such cooperation between Government and the private sector. Our agricultural and industrial infrastructure were built on it. Our citizens and our Government have consistently shown their willingness to mobilize resources and energy on behalf of clearly defined national goals. It was just such a policy that created one of the world's most competitive agriculture sectors in the second half of the 19th century, that created and fostered the civil aviation industry in the 1920's, and that made our aerospace industry competitive in the 1950's and 1960's. There are also other, more recent and more specific examples, and, Mr. President, I ask that summaries of several of them be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

This is not news to students of history, but it clearly escaped the Reagan and Bush administrations' attention. They have not recognized how technology is changing the face of economics: how to support technology development within a Government framework that maintains competitiveness; how to translate technology into high quality marketable products; how to pay as much attention to manufacturing technology as we do to basic research. There are a growing number of Members of Congress talking about this, but you will be hard-pressed to find anyone in the administration giving it anything but lip service.

Americans are beginning to understand that the health of the critical industries of the future—semiconductors and the means to make them, computers, lasers, composite materials, telecommunications equipment, robotics, ceramics—cannot be left to chance. Our continued status as the world's leader depends on their prosperity. And their prosperity can on longer be left solely to the market.

In many respects this is a more sophisticated version of the debate we have had over infrastructure in the past. Governments have been supporting infrastructure for 5,000 years. Up until now we have defined it as roads and bridges, concrete and steel. In the 21st century, however, it will be telecommunications and information, fiber optics and computers. Instead of the interstate highway system, we will be talking about smart highways and supersonic air transport. These are the things that will drive our economy in the future, and the government's responsibility for them will be no different than its public works responsibilities in the past.

The national economic leadership strategy expands our research and development efforts in these critical technologies, and it proposes important new initiatives for turning laboratory ideas into marketable products. We are all familiar with examples like the VCR and the facsimile machine—products invented here and produced elsewhere.

Making marketable products means learning how to move from making something work once to learning how to make thousands of them at low cost and high quality. That involves different skills—designing for consumer needs and and pocket books and developing more sophisticated and flexible manufacturing techniques that can respond to the high quality and variable production demands of high tech products.

This may require a Federal hand. Proposals in our package include an Advanced Technologies Capital Consortium [ATCC], which Congressman BOB TORRICELLI and I introduced earlier this year, and a Civilian Technology Corporation, to be introduced shortly by Senator HOLLINGS. Both will have some federal funds, but will be led by private sector decisionmakers to supplement the private venture capital market in support of technology commercialization.

This is important not because we want products with "Made in America" labels on them. It is important because it is product sales and the profits they make that produce the investment that will create the next generation of technology. Companies don't undertake research and development out of whole cloth. It takes large amounts of money. Historically, the bulk of that money comes from earnings generated by these companies. In short, if we don't make anything, ultimately we will not invent anything either. That is why the policies we pursue must be oriented at manufacturing technology and commercialization and not just at the "generic, precompetitive research and development" the President says he supports.

The strategy also focuses on quality jobs by upgrading the education and job skills of our work force, and it reorients our trade policy in the direction of more efficient export promotion and market access abroad. Taken together, the components of this strategy will lead to more high quality jobs for Americans, jobs that will keep us growing and prosperous into the 21st century. I am also pleased that a number of my proposals are included in this package that will help make sure some of the jobs end up in West Virginia.

This strategy is also timely because of the election. Usually the contest for votes bogs down in debate over the issue of today and the soundbite of last week. We can and must do better than that. We are stewards of the country for our children. We owe it to them and to ourselves to plan for the future to insure that the next generation will inherit a strong and prosperous America. The national economic leadership strategy is a road map to achieve that goal.

CASE STUDIES

THE COMPUTER INDUSTRY

Federal R&D support was essential to the creation of the U.S. computer industry. The first companies were constructed as part of military research and development projects during World War II. Between 1945 and 1955, all major computer technology projects in the U.S. were supported by the Federal government. During the 1950's and 60's government purchases of semiconductors for missile guidance systems aided the development of the U.S. computer industry. The technology that helped make personal computers possible was developed as part of NASA's Apollo program.

The computer industry is a good example of how the government and private sector can successfully work together, from the R&D stage through product commercialization. Take a look at two leading companies; Cray Research, Inc. and IBM. Cray Research developed the supercomputer under contract to the federal Los Alamos National Laboratory. During the 1940's and 50's, IBM developed electronics and computer products that were purchased mainly by the Federal government. IBM received additional support from the government in the form of R&D funding for programs like the B-52 bomber and its navigation system. IBM has successfully applied technological advances gained in government-supported projects to commercial products.

ATM MACHINES, CREDIT CARDS, AND OTHER PRODUCTS OF COMPUTER NETWORKING TECHNOLOGY

Today, we can get cash almost everywhere, 24 hours a day, thanks to automatic teller machines. And if we don't want to pay cash, we can use our credit cards in most places thanks to technology that allows merchants to instantly check whether cards are stolen or invalid.

The Federal government played a key role in developing the computer networking technologies that make ATMs and credit cards possible. In the late 1960s, the federally funded Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA) used digital technology to link computers for the first time. Since then, computer networks have grown faster, larger, and more secure. Today, networks enable computers around the country to "talk" to each other, transmitting pages of information in seconds, far faster than the best fax machines.

The Federal government continues to support computer networking technology. The National Science Foundation, in cooperation with DARPA, the private sector, states, and universities, has built the NSFNET, a high-speed computer network connecting hundreds of colleges and universities around the country. The networking technology being developed for the NSFNET will one day allow network users to talk face-to-face despite being thousands of miles apart. Coworkers on opposite coasts will be able to work together as effectively as if they were in the same room.

DARPA: THE DEFENSE ADVANCED RESEARCH PROJECTS AGENCY

Perhaps the best known example of government support for cutting-edge technologies is The Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, or DARPA.

Though its mission has been defined by the Pentagon, DARPA has spawned a number of important civilian technology breakthroughs: mainframe and super computers; flat panel displays used in High Definition Television (HDTV) and lap top computers; SEMATECH, which is a consortia of computer chip manufacturers; and a number of advanced computer techniques like packet switching. To quote the New York Times, "DARPA almost single-handedly founded the fields of material science and computer science in the U.S. paving the way not only for the smart weapons of the Persian Gulf war but the personal computer industry."

THE AEROSPACE AND COMMERCIAL AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

The United States government played a key role in the development of civilian aircraft.

Prior to World War II, a Federal agency call the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics (NACA) supported civilian aircraft research and development. NACA was responsible for aeronautical innovations such as: a wind tunnel built in Langley, Virginia; an engine cowl which reduced wind drag; aerodynamic efficiency research which helped determine optimal engine placement; and a new family of airfoils which allowed engineers to test different wing designs. NACA was absorbed by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) in 1958.

There are several lessons to be learned from NACA's success. First, NACA's research efforts were industry-led. NACA chose research projects based on what industry needed, not on what NACA wanted. Second, NACA studied not only whether new technologies were feasible, but also how new technologies could be manufactured.

After World War II, military R&D aided the commercial aircraft industry. Manufacturers that worked in both the military and civilian markets, like Boeing and General Electric, were able to use defense contract dollars to lower production costs for not only their military operations, but also their civilian ones. Also, companies were able to apply technologies developed for military use to civilian use. As a result, U.S. firms still dominate the commercial aerospace industry.

THE BIOMEDICAL INDUSTRY

The U.S. biomedical industry is one of the strongest in the world largely because of federal support. The government funds biomedical research through the National Institutes of Health (NIH), the National Science Foundation (NSF), the Department of Defense (DOD), the Department of Energy (DOE), and the Department of Agriculture (DOA). Such research has led to medical breakthroughs such as gene therapy and the discovery of the virus that causes AIDS. Also, federally-funded R&D has spawned the development of human insulin, human growth hormones, drugs to treat kidney transplant rejections, drugs to help prevent hepatitis B, and a test for HIV infection.

Federal support for biomedicine has succeeded because the government has worked in collaboration with the private sector. Often, in conducting biotechnology research, government-supported universities enter into long-term cooperative agreements with individual firms. Also, NIH, the leading provider of R&D and training to the biomedical industry, has built strong relationships to the health care industry.

VIDEO CASSETTE RECORDERS—A CASE STUDY IN FAILURE

Why? There are two reasons. First, Japanese firms focus on the long term in commercializing products. They endure flat or negative cash returns during the many years it takes to bring a low-cost, high quality product like the VCR to market. Second, Japanese firms focus on the manufacturing process, requiring design engineers and manufacturing engineers to work together as a team to develop a high quality product that can be manufactured cost-effectively.

As a result of America's failure to commercialize video recording technology, Japan has cornered the market for one of the most lucrative consumer electronics products.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senator has 5 minutes.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that I might be recognized for an additional 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CONRAD). Without objection, it is so ordered.

U.S. ECONOMIC LEADERSHIP STRATEGY

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, yesterday I was proud to join the majority leader and several of my colleagues, including Senators LIEBERMAN, ROCKEFELLER, BINGAMAN, and a number of others, in announcing a new U.S. economic leadership strategy to give Americans quality, high-paying jobs, to give our children better and more fruitful educational opportunities, and to give all of us a safer and cleaner environment in which to enjoy life.

Just a few nights ago, President Bush said that he cannot understand why people think the economy is getting worse because he knows it is getting better.

Well, look at today's economic news. Last month, unemployment rose again to 7.8 percent the worst rate since 1984. This was the second month in a row that unemployment has gone up. All but 1 of the 11 major industrial States had increases in unemployment. The highest rate was in California with 9.5 percent, up from 8.7 percent in May.

One of the economists interviewed in reaction to this news this morning was an economist in Chicago named Robert Deidrich, and he said this report is not what we were expecting. He said:

> It is just a bummer across the board. It's like you have glue on your feet. The economy just can't seem to get out of this.

The analyst for the Associated Press summarized it by saying, and again I quote:

> The unexpected weakness in June employment raises the prospect that economic growth could stall out just as it did last summer after a short-lived increase.

You know what that would be called, Mr. President? A triple-dip recession.

And what is the Bush-Quayle administration doing about it? Not much. The administration has no strategy for ending the recession, no strategy for getting this country moving again. It has no plan to deal with the rising unemployment rate and the loss of competitiveness.

Senate Democrats yesterday proposed a comprehensive, bold, visionary plan to get this country moving again. There is a stark contrast between the do-nothing, wishful-thinking approach of the Bush-Quayle administration and the economic leadership strategy which Senator MITCHELL and Senate Democrats announced yesterday.

In the middle of this century, there was a colorful personality named Clementine Paddleford, and she once said, quoting her own mother, "You shouldn't grow a wishbone where a backbone ought to be."

For years now, the Bush-Quayle administration has tried to wish America into being a world competitor again, and what is the result? Not only are we unprepared to lead the world economy tomorrow, we cannot even hold our place today. Wishing and hoping cannot prepare us for a better future.

The new Democratic economic leadership strategy puts backbone in America's economic posture and helps us face the future with purpose and vision. It creates economic strength by beginning and enlarging a variety of programs and initiatives that clear a path for new ideas to become new products and new jobs. Programs like the Advanced Technology Program, the Small Business Innovation and Research Program, the Manufacturing Technology Centers Program, and others can nurture and facilitate industrial innovation and enhance productivity.

Mr. President, the Information Infrastructure Act of 1992, which I introduced yesterday as one of the components of this new economic leadership strategy, will provide the central nervous system for this new economic resurgence. It will speed the distribution of information for education, health care, and manufacturing. I am convinced that this new economic strategy will turn American ingenuity into high-quality American jobs.

The administration seems content to count any job as a good job, and as a result more and more workers are consigned to low-skilled, low-paying jobs that leave their own skills untapped and their hopes unfulfilled. No wonder many Americans express the fear that their sons and daughters might have a lower standard of living than they do.

There is no question that the United States of America leads the world in bright ideas. It is time that we use those ideas to create a brighter future, a future in which Americans produce high-quality products that make for better jobs and a better world.

We know what the critical technologies for the future are. Industry is telling us, it is not a great mystery. And we have the ability to speed their development and commercialization, if we have the national will and if we have leadership instead of the wishbone approach of the Bush-Quayle administration.

This new economic leadership strategy that was announced yesterday will help our children help themselves through improved educational opportunities. It also includes job training and vocational education programs to better equip Americans for a changing future where the capacity to learn new skills is itself a valuable skill.

While there are many other goals in our strategy, I wish to close by accentuating one of them and talk about how a better economy and a better environment can be secured together.

The Japanese and the Germans are now openly saying that the biggest new market in the history of world business is the market for the new products and processes that will foster economic progress without environmental destruction. Millions of jobs are at stake unless we lead the environmental revolution. Mexico City is closing down factories today, not because of their economy but because they are choking to death on the pollution. They are desperate to get, not new laser-guided missile technology but new machinery, new processes to put their people back to work without choking their children. Thirty-five percent of our exports last year went to developing countries, and virtually all of them are asking for the new approaches that will not devastate their environment but allow them nonetheless to move forward toward better standards of living. The Bush-Quayle administration has completely missed the boat on this as they have on the economy generally.

That is part of the economic leadership strategy that we announced yesterday to move our country into a leadership position on these new environmental technologies. So whether it is the Information Infrastructure Act, or the New Technologies for a Sustainable World Act, or the manufacturing extension centers, or any of the other provisions in this comprehensive package, this formula will get this country moving again, and it poses the starkest possible contrast with the Bush-Quayle do-nothing wishbone approach which again has produced an increase in the unemployment rates and the specter of a triple-dip recession with no relief anywhere on the horizon except with new leadership of this country.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

THE NOMINATION PROCESS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, it was just 1 year ago yesterday that President Bush nominated Judge Clarence Thomas to be an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. On the anniversary of this nomination some reflection on that nomination and the subsequent confirmation are in order.

In my view the Thomas confirmation process distorted beyond recognition the process created by the Framers of our Constitution. Congress did not act in full accord with its article II responsibilities to advise and consent. This was true in a number of respects.

I would like to speak to just three of those.

First, Congress sought to dictate to the President who the nominee should be. Whether described as "compromise" or described as "consultation," many Members of this body believe that the President must compromise his choice of a nominee with various Senators. I suppose the more powerful the Senators happen to be the more that would be the case. The President may act wisely and probably would be acting wisely to take some congressional opinion into account.

Nonetheless, under our Constitution, the President has the sole power to choose nominees to the Supreme Court. Although as Justice Jackson noted several decades ago, our constitutional system of three branches is often one of shared powers. The President's power to nominate is not, however, shared with Congress.

Notwithstanding this unambiguous fact, some Members of this body set forth the remarkable notion that the President should consider balance on the Court in selecting his nominees. This notion of balance has no historical basis. As an example, Franklin Roosevelt did not consider balance when he made his seventh and eighth nominations to the Supreme Court. Lyndon Johnson did not consider balance when he named Justices to what was already the most ideologically monolithic Court in the history of our country. Few, if anyone, suggested that Presidents Johnson or Franklin Roosevelt should have.

The second way that Congress violated article II was the opposite of arrogating power beyond that granted, as in seeking to invade Presidential prerogative. Congress in this instance delegated public power to private groups.

In fact, we had two Senates considering the Clarence Thomas nomination last fall. One Senate was this body of 100 elected by the people of their respective States for 6 years, to exercise constitutional powers. This Senate was ultimately responsible to the people for its exercise of those powers.

Additionally, someplace in that big black hole existed a shadow Senate. The shadow Senate consisted of special interest groups, not elected by anyone, for any term, and of course responsible to no one. Yet the shadow Senate also exercised the advise and consent function committed exclusively to the people's representatives in this Senate.

The shadow Senate consisted of advocacy groups whose views have been decisively rejected in so many recent Presidential elections, particularly those in which the winning President's view of putting strict constructionists on the Supreme Court was made very clear.

Notwithstanding their failure to get their agenda adopted through the democratic legislative process, these special interest groups in the last several decades have been able to impose their agenda through an unelected activist Supreme Court, typically making law rather than interpreting law.

When Clarence Thomas was nominated 1 year ago, the shadow Senate was already making pronouncements that they would "Bork" him. They were wrong. Judge Bork was treated gently compared to Judge Thomas. The shadow Senate sent out all points bulletins to the faithful: Give us your dirt on Clarence Thomas. Various disclosures were made in an unending barrage attempting to kill the nomination. There was no interest in objectively examining this man's qualifications. We had advocacy groups willing to do anything to keep this man off the Supreme Court.

They conducted a large part of the investigation that normally would be done by congressional investigators. These non-Government investigators, not publicly responsible to the people by the way, decided what information would come out about the nominee, when that would happen, and even where it would happen.

By the time the confirmation hearings began, the shadow Senate had distorted Judge Thomas beyond recognition. Yet, despite Judge Thomas' impressive performance before the committee, the shadow Senate would not take no for an answer.

The shadow Senate badgered a woman whose life will never be the same to come forward. She refused in those first instances, and she did it in order to keep her privacy.

Ultimately, she let the Judiciary Committee know her name so that an FBI investigation could be conducted. This action, not the public hearings, shows that the committee took Professor Hill's charges seriously. The FBI investigated and could not determine the truth of her allegations. So the committee in late September moved forward with the nomination.

We must remember that the lurid details of Professor Hill's testimony that simultaneously electrified and sickened the Nation were never mentioned prior to the televised hearings.

After the committee vote, an act of treachery against Professor Hill occurred: Someone acting for the shadow Senate made this woman's unsubstantiated allegations public. At that point, the constitutional process was over. We were now in the war of all against all.

The shadow Senate turned a confirmation process regarding the fitness of a particular individual to sit on the Supreme Court into a societal battle deliberately framed as pitting men against women. I hope we will never see this again. All I would add here is that I hope we will return to a process in which advocacy groups are not the key players and in which nomination hearings are serious efforts to determine competence, rather than some political campaigns, as if people were running to be elected to the Supreme Court as opposed to being nominated and selected for the Supreme Court.

To the extent that the Supreme Court practices judicial restraint, and leaves political decisions to the political branches, particularly the legislative branch, there is no need for political campaigns over the confirmation of its members.

The third way that Congress violated its article II power to advise and consent was its usurpation of the judiciary's article III power to say what the law is. This occurred during the real confirmation hearings. Judge Thomas repeatedly was asked to state his views on various Supreme Court cases, or cases that have already gone by. Each of these issues very likely would come before the Supreme Court some time during his tenure on that court.

Senators can ask a nominee these questions. I am not going to tell Senators what they can ask or cannot ask.

But it is wrong to require a nominee to answer them. A judicial nominee must be impartial, he must appear impartial, and most important, he must be faithful to the Constitution. Were Judge Thomas to have answered these questions, he would have violated all of these commands.

A judge must impartially decide the cases that come before her. If a nominee tells Congress how she will decide particular cases, how can litigants who appear before the nominee as a judge be confident that the judge will be impartial, never mind appear impartial? Additionally, a nominee who tells Congress how he will decide particular issues essentially makes political campaign promises to obtain confirmation votes from individual Senators.

Frequently, the questions relate to the issues of importance to the advocacy groups. Such a spectacle in evaluating someone for an unelected position specifically designed to be insulated from political pressures is unacceptable. Even worse, it makes Congress rather than the courts the ultimate authority on the meaning of the Constitution. When a case arises that a Justice has told Congress that she will decide in a particular way, the Justice may feel bound to the promise. This is a violation of the Constitution.

Congressionally imposed promises cannot rank as a higher authority governing decisions than the Justice's own independent consideration of the Constitution, after reading briefs and hearing arguments. Congress does not have the ultimate word on constitutional interpretation. Events of the past year could convince one to the contrary.

To those who threaten not to confirm any nominee who will not answer questions regarding specific cases and doctrines, I can only respond that under our constitutional system, it is the nominee who answers these questions who deserves to be rejected.

Perhaps those who demand answers from the nominee on issues likely to confront the confirmed Justice believe that the Justice cannot be objective. They may think that Justices should and do decide cases on the basis of their policy preferences. Such a view denies the existence of law. Justices, at least those who believe in judicial restraint, apply the law rather than their own personal beliefs. Thus, a nominee's personal agreement with the merits or reasoning of a particular case is irrelevant to the confirmation process.

Senators can ask certain general questions to prospective nominees: How they generally approach constitutional adjudication and statutory construction, the role of precedent, and other similar issues. Senators can determine sufficiently the nominees' judicial and constitutional philosophy from the answers to these questions and from the nominee's writings, including judicial decisions if any. Senators can determine character and other relevant issues, such as the nominee's familiarity with decisional law, as well.

But if the Senate continues to subject nominees to the process that we utilized beginning 1 year ago yesterday, the country will lose the ability to have the best and brightest appointed to such positions. We must return to the basics and particularly constitutional basics. We must exercise all the powers available to us under article II's advise and consent clause, but we, and we alone, in the Senate, must exercise only those powers.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

EXTENSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for morning business be extended to 10:45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROE VERSUS WADE

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, in connection with what was said by the Senator from Iowa, I think it must be said that now on the Supreme Court there are nine Justices, and we know what each one feels about the very emotional, difficult subject of Roe v Wade. I say that with respect for my friend from Iowa. I have not voted on Justice Souter or Justice Thomas as a consequence of their position on that issue. But now knowing what all the Justices believe, it will become much more important to me; and indeed it is important to the President, because he sends the Solicitor General up to the Supreme Court to attempt to reverse Roe v Wade. Reagan-Bush appointees in their declaration in support of Roe v Wade were very strong in saying that that assault is creating problems.

THE SITUATION ON CAMBODIA

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, today, two important tests of our capacity to respond to international outlawry and foster democracy are occurring in Yugoslavia and Cambodia. Both require moral judgment and action by the United States. Neither present a clear and easy course with ready references to previous actions. Each precedent setting moves require an internal compass. America is, itself, the result of initiatives launched into uncharted waters.

We stand at an important moment of history. The strength of our convictions will determine the course of future events. It is far from clear whether the ancient but resurgent forces of global disorder or the new forces of order will prevail. Led by a determined America it is vital that the international community demonstrate—and demonstrate quickly—it has the will and the capacity to control international violence and outlawry. Success is not optional; it is imperative.

The brave, new postcold war world we are entering is neither a comfortable nor an orderly place. As the screw of tyranny has been loosened, long-suppressed nationalisms, ethnic rivalries and class hatreds have exploded violently into full, horrifying view. The strange place names and growing size of the list must not obscure the real life tragedies that occur when such conflicts cannot or will not be resolved peacefully.

Sarajevo, Yugoslavia, is a name familiar to us from the 1984 winter Olympics. Cambodia we know from the "Killing Fields," the methodical genocide of at least a million people by the Khmer Rouge from 1975 to 1978.

The scene of senseless killing in Sarajevo detailed by a single brave American journalist, John Burns, contains the murderous nature of those who ascribe higher purpose to their killing. Stark bravery of innocents exposed to danger inspire an impulse to help. When the cry for help is heard something in our nature tells us we must go, and quickly.

Mr. Burns has told many heroic stories, but one stands out. He describes the actions Mr. Vedran Smailovic, a 36-year-old cellist in the Sarajevo opera:

> My mother is a Muslim and my father if a Muslim, but I don't care. I am a Sarajevan, I am a cosmopolitan, I am a pacifist. I am nothing special, I am a musician, I am part of the town. Like everyone else, I do what I can.

What Mr. Smailovic does is to play his cello each day at 4 p.m. at the same spot in the middle of Vase Miskina Street. According to Mr. Burns:

> The spot he has chosen is outside the bakery where several high-explosive rounds struck a bread line 12 days ago, killing 22 people and wounding more than 100. If he holds to his plan, there will be 22 performances before his gesture has run its course.

The Serbian gunners who killed these 22 hungry Sarajevans were still firing 155-millimeter howitzer shells down on the city while the one man concert was in progress. For the uninitiated, a 155 round is a big shell; a very big shell. The high order explosion and high velocity shrapnel are more than deadly; they are terrifying. They disorient as they dish out death.

In Cambodia the stories are of children whose legs have been amputated by the most dense and random placement of landmines in the history of this kind of warfare. I visited the refugee camps in Thailand in 1990 where 375,000 Cambodians live in a squalor made partially livable by U.N. efforts. As an amputee myself who received remarkable health care, I was painfully conscious of the limited range of these innocent childrens' lives which would result because of inadequate medical resources.

In Cambodia, prime responsibility for the killings rest with the Khmer Rouge, still led by Pol Pot and his clique, who have been given new legitimacy by the peace agreement signed October 23, 1991. The recent stories tell of the Khmer Rouge's firing on U.N. helicopters and their unwillingness to abide by the terms of the agreements second phase. Consensus is building of their intent to use whatever means necessary to return themselves to power.

In some cases we cannot and should not act. Lasting peace begins when men and women agree to respect a higher law and to resist violent means toward noble ends. In the absence of the willingness to resolve differences peacefully, we will find it difficult to separate warring factions. American intervention should not be based upon the emotional response of simply wanting to help. In some cases we must check our emotional response with caution.

However, America's capacity for moral leadership and forceful action put us in a position of either answering the call for help or answering why we did not. Answering the call does not mean we need to act on our own. The end of the cold war has made possible unprecedented multinational efforts to deal with these conflicts.

In Cambodia and Yugoslavia we have acted as a part of U.N. peacekeeping efforts. We have begun the difficult job of securing a peace. The peacekeeping force in Cambodia involves 16,000 troops, 3,600 police and 2,400 civilians. The cost in dollars is estimated at $2 billion.

At the outset we must recognize this is our force. They represent our interest in international justice. It is crucial to the success of these men and women that we act as if they were our sons and daughters rather than remote blue helmets.

Equally crucial to the success of these operations is to move the peacekeeping contribution from the U.S. State Department to the U.S. Defense Department. The big dollar costs are the military items not the diplomatic. As such it makes sense to budget peacekeeping contributions in DOD.

Finally, we must demonstrate our resolve. All parties must know that we will not be pushed around. Today I will limit my discussion to necessary adjustments in Cambodia if we want this operation to be a success.

Cambodia, that small, tragic country in the midst of Southeast Asia has become the scene of the most ambitious U.N. peacekeeping effort in history. The U.N. Transitional Authority in Cambodia [UNTAC] will have more authority, deploy more forces, and spend more money than any previous U.N. operation. Most challenging of all, the United Nations is deploying into a country where a 20-year civil war has been suspended, but not resolved. One of the parties to that conflict, the notorious Khmer Rouge, was directly and deliberately responsible for the extermination of over 20 percent of the Cambodian population in 3 years of genocidal rule—making it probably the bloodiest regime in the history of mankind.

Few who have studied the Khmer Rouge believe they have any intention of abiding by the international agreements they signed calling for a U.N. presence in Cambodia to administer a cease-fire, demobilization of forces, and an election. Already the Khmer Rouge has resisted the movement of U.N. peacekeepers into their zones of control and in at least one instance fired on a U.N. helicopter. Watching these developments, there are many who have proclaimed the bad news from Cambodia—that the U.N. peacekeeping effort is doomed to failure.

The news from Cambodia is not bad, it is good. There are certainly reasons for pessimism, but the reasons for optimism are more compelling. This was made clear in Tokyo last weekend. Thirty-three nations and twelve international organizations, plus observers from a number of nongovernmental organizations, met in Tokyo for the Ministerial Conference on Rehabilitation and Reconstruction of Cambodia. They convened in response to an urgent appeal from the U.N. Secretary General to commit funds, personnel, and other resources to support UNTAC operations and to sustain the provision of vital services by the existing Government infrastructure in Cambodia.

The good news comprises several points:

Delegation after delegation pledged full support and confidence in UNTAC and its chief, Special Representative Yasushi Akashi.

Delegation after delegation declared their determination to see the settlement process through to a successful conclusion.

Japan moved center stage for the first time in a U.N. peacekeeping effort by hosting the conference and pledging substantial financial support. Moreover, two of the key international officials leading the U.N. effort—Mr. Akashi and the High Commissioner of the UNHCR, Ms. Sadako Ogata—are Japanese.

Japan and Germany, for the first time, are contributing uniformed military personnel to a U.N. peacekeeping effort.

The United States was well represented by one of its most senior and experienced officials, Deputy Secretary Lawrence Eagleburger. He delivered a strong statement making it clear that the United States intended to support UNTAC to the fullest.

The Khmer Rouge were increasingly isolated as delegation after delegation called upon them to cease placing obstacles in UNTAC's path. Many, including the United States, made it clear they would support Cambodian reconstruction with or without Khmer Rouge cooperation and—if necessary—in the teeth of Khmer Rouge resistance.

China, long the leading supporter of the Khmer Rouge, clearly distanced themselves from that past policy.

Mr. Akashi and General Sanderson, commander of the U.N. military forces in Cambodia, have proven themselves to be gifted and determined leaders of the U.N. presence on the ground.

Where do we go from here? I believe the principles which should guide us are clear:

We should move away from evenhandedness. The Khmer Rouge should pay a price for noncooperation. They should not be allowed to negotiate their way back in.

We must be absolutely determined to see the reconstruction and rehabilitation effort through to a successful conclusion—the resettlement of 350,000 refugees and the election of a secure non-Khmer Rouge government in Cambodia.

We must be tactically flexible. In particular, we must be prepared to redefine the ground rules for UNTAC to permit it to support all non-Khmer Rouge Cambodians against the Khmer Rouge if the latter continues to resist implementation of the U.N. mandate.

We must make it crystal clear to the Khmer Rouge that we will not be intimidated and that we will prevail. In the words of Secretary Eagleburger:

> It is vitally important * * * that the people of Cambodia have confidence that the international community will not fold its tent at the first sign of difficulty, but instead will work to defend a fair process and to implement a fair agreement. I can assure you that for its part, the United States will not be tempted or intimidated into withdrawing from this process.

We must remember, that in the last analysis the solution must be one reached by the Khmer people themselves.

We should support Secretary General Boutris Ghali's May 1992 appeal for $125 million in commodity aid and balance of payment support in order to avert runaway inflation and the disintegration of the civil service, to help stabilize the economic and social institutions.

As the next major step, we should be prepared to go back to the U.N. Security Council and seek a resolution, backed by sanctions, requiring Khmer Rouge cooperation with the peace agreement, and calling upon Thailand, in particular, to close its borders to Khmer Rouge logging and gem smuggling and to cease providing sanctuary to Khmer Rouge leaders.

To quote Secretary Eagleburger again:

> Our goal should be to reassure those who fear the Accords will not work properly, and to prevent those who fear the Accords will work properly from undermining a process which has the firm and solemn backing of the international community. As far as the United States is concerned, we do not believe that efforts to halt this process should be cost-free to those involved, nor do we believe that we should encourage parties bent on sabotaging the Accords to entertain the prospect of success. The peace process can go forward in their absence.

What is at stake in Cambodia is no less than a test of our capacity to build a peaceful post-cold war world. Every nation, certainly including our own, has a vital interest in the success of that effort. If a just international order is to be built, the United Nations and its affiliated organizations must be capable of playing a central role. Cambodia is nothing less than a proving ground for that shared future. When U.N. forces don the blue helmets and deploy into the Cambodian countryside, they cease to be Irish, or Dutch, or Malaysian—they become, in effect, Americans—because they are one of our own.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I will try in the time allowed me to summarize.

We have begun U.N. Efforts in Cambodia. It is a precedent-setting United Nations effort. America's commitment will be relatively small as part of the $2 billion U.N. movement. This has never occurred before in the history of the world, this kind of a peacekeeping effort. The one thing above all that is paramount for us to succeed is for the people of Cambodia to know that it is their solution, but that we are resolute in our commitment and that we will make certain that we abide and that all parties abide by the terms of the agreement.

Mr. President, I believe the only way that will occur is if we consider the young men and women who are part of this international force, as well as the young men and women who are arriving today from Canada to secure the Sarajevan airport. We must act as if they are our sons and daughters. If we look at these young men and women, saying they are part of some other nation's effort, we will fail to follow through.

Mr. President, I know people are confused abut what is going on in Cambodia. The recent reports have been filled with some bad news. I believe it is mostly good news. The United States sent its best people, Assistant Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, to Tokyo last week. We have progress in place. I believe, Mr. President, we need to say to the Khmer Rouge, who acted like outlaws the past 3 or 4 weeks, we will not give you the opportunity to negotiate your way back in.

We must be resolute with those who have violated the conditions of this agreement. We must consider even going to the U.N. Security Council to change the agreement itself so that the peaceful election that will occur next spring will not allow the outlaws themselves to come back into power.

Mr. President, I appreciate the time that I have been given. I believe that this moment in history must be seized by the United States of America. It is in our interest to do so. It is in our interest to look into these uncharted waters for ways to win this peace. We will be required to be resolute. We cannot allow the killing that goes on in this world to be simply another news story that we read in the morning and move to the side of our desk.

Mr. President, I appreciate this time and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair, are we still in morning business at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The Senator is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, at this time, because of complications and developments, I am going to yield my 10 minutes under the order to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Senator SARBANES.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Maryland if he might yield to me for 2 minutes, and then he will use the remainder of the time for his statement which is more important, but I have just a short statement I wish to make.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator the 2 minutes.

FREEDOM SUPPORT ACT

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I want to support the efforts of the Senator from Maryland and I shall remain on the floor to do so. He has a very important message for us this morning. I simply want to rise at this moment in time and to make my statement in support of the Freedom Support Act, which we are debating today.

I am a strong supporter of this and I am very concerned that we must help these people that have been in the former Soviet Republics to move toward democracy, because we cannot let despair, unemployment and hunger destroy the fabric of their society and thereby turn them toward nondemocratic processes.

I have always felt the American and Russian people had a long tie between them, even in the height of the cold war in the 1970's. When I was Secretary of Transportation during my visits on technical matters to Moscow, Leningrad and other cities, we were warmly received and the friendship was obvious. We want to be certain that this continues and I particularly want to express my interest in eastern Russia.

We forget too often about it. It is very much like the United States was during the period of the 1930's and 1940's with our people a great resource but with the inability to have capital to invest and with the infrastructure not completed.

I am pleased that the people in the State of Washington have now strengthened the ties, having sister cities of Vladivostok-Tacoma, and there are going to be conferences in the State of Washington. I look forward to President Yeltsin working in that area and I hope we can assist in this. I hope we will be in the forefront of the efforts to do it.

We cannot let the people of the former empire to lose hope. Therefore, I hope we pass the legislation.

Despite our strong ties, the outcome of our effort is by no means certain. I do not hold with the end of history theorists.

Democracy is not necessarily the end result of historical progression. We have already seen some of the many forces that could undermine democracy—nationalism, ethnic unrest, poverty, and unemployment.

It is a down payment on our Nation's commitment to the future of this important region and thus to the world. It sends a strong signal that we in the West will not turn our backs on these new nations.

Here at home we face extremely tight budgets and pressing needs. This legislation will not divert a penny away from our domestic agenda. The firewalls of the 1990 budget agreement makes sure of that.

The bill has been well described in the debate. I have cosponsored certain amendments which I have set forth in my more detailed statement.

The bill authorizes the U.S. share of the $24 billion multilateral aid package announced in April. It authorizes the United States share of the International Monetary Fund's quota increase, to begin IMF lending to the former Soviet States for economic reform.

It also authorizes a variety of U.S. assistance programs, including student and professional exchanges, technical assistance, agricultural aid, and assistance in defense conversion.

I am a cosponsor of the amendment of Senator WELLSTONE to promote grassroots, governmental exchanges, and support Senator BRADLEY's student exchange amendment.

I am also pleased the bill contains Senator CRANSTON'S provision to promote the weapons-for-wheat idea. Barter, like using proceeds from the sale of our agricultural commodities to help dismantle nuclear weapons, is a creative idea. I am pursuing a parallel effort through the agricultural appropriations process.

In the last several years, the people of Washington State have strengthened their ties with the people of the former Soviet Union, in particular, the people in the Russian Far East.

This is reflected in the sister port relationship between Tacoma and Vladivostok, and in the announcement during President Yeltsin's visit that the two newest consulates to be opened will be in Seattle and Vladivostok.

I have met with officials from this area of the Russian Republic and have been impressed by their enthusiasm for joint projects.

Both in terms of humanitarian assistance and in trade and investment opportunities, Washington has been at the forefront in responding to opportunities in eastern Russia.

I have been proud to assist a number of these efforts and commend the citizens of my State for their optimism and tenacity in the face of endless bureaucracy on both sides of the Pacific Ocean.

All of us cheered Russian President Boris Yeltsin when he addressed the Congress a few weeks ago.

We cheered because we believe in what he said. More importantly, we cheered because we believe in what he is trying to do.

The obstacles facing the successor States of the Soviet Union are tremendous. The process of reform and democratic consolidation will be long.

We simply cannot allow the peoples of this vast former empire to lose hope. I urge my colleagues to support this vital legislation.

I thank the Senator from Maryland. He has a very important message. I hope we will be helpful in helping him in presenting this message to the American people.

I yield back the time.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the very able Senator from Arkansas yielding me time.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, this morning the Joint Economic Committee met to receive the employment and unemployment figures for the month of June. The grim, dismal unemployment statistics reported this morning are dramatic proof that the economy remains in the grip of a serious and prolonged recession. For the second month in a row, the unemployment rate surged by three-tenths of a percent. It has gone from 7.2 to 7.8 percent in 2 months time. The 7.8-percent figure is the highest unemployment rate since March of 1984, more than 8 years ago.

Mr. President, this chart tracks the movement of the unemployment rate during this recession. Two years ago, in June of 1990, the unemployment rate was 5.3 percent. It has risen through this recession almost in a steady progression with some ups and downs, and it has now gone to 7.8 percent, the highest since March of 1984. This represents 10 million Americans unemployed.

The reason these figures have gone through the chart is we did not expect these high figures this morning. In fact, we were expecting an improvement. We did not redo the chart because we thought we would be working within the parameters of these lines. Instead, it has taken off again.

We had a three-tenths of an increase last month, another three-tenths this month. We are now up to just under 10 million Americans counted as jobless by the Department's official figures. As bad as those numbers are, the real labor number market is even worse.

The Labor Department today released figures on the comprehensive unemployment rate for the second quarter of 1992. This is a rate which includes discouraged workers and those working part time because they cannot find full-time work. That rate rose to 10.9 percent in the second quarter of 1992. The last time it was that high was in the last quarter of 1984.

Now this 10.9 percent figure represents the 10 million unemployed under the official rate, another 1.1 million so discouraged that they dropped out of the labor force, and 6 million people working part time who want to find full-time work.

These figures are an absolute disaster—7.8 percent unemployment rate, 10.9 percent comprehensive unemployment rate—these unemployment figures are the worst in more than 8 years.

The impression that the economy is starting to weaken again is confirmed by a variety of other statistics released in the past month.

New home sales have fallen 4 months in a row. Building permits have fallen for 4 months. Housing starts are down 8 percent over the last 2 months. This is very distressing since we often rely on the housing sector to help bring us out of the recession.

New claims for unemployment insurance are rising from a weekly average of just over 400,000 in May and early June to over 420,000 for each of the past 2 weeks.

New orders for durable goods fell in May.

Exports, which people have been forecasting would pull us out of the recession, fell in April; this is the second decline in a row. The purchasing manager's survey fell 4 points in June, from 56 to 52. Fifty is the level they use to say we are in a recession.

And the worst economic news is in the labor market. Job growth remains weak, unemployment high, with little evidence of a turnaround. Large companies are continuing to announce massive layoffs. This past week alone, Aetna Life & Casualty said it would lay off 4,800 employees, which is more than 10 percent of its work force. Hughes Aircraft announced it will lay off 9,000 employees, 15 percent of its work force. Obviously, these figures do little to restore confidence in a labor market shaken by 2 years of recession.

After four quarters of weak economic growth, the American labor market is in the midst of a profound job recession. The current recession began in June 1990. This chart shows that we are currently in a jobs recession. The dark line is this recession, the dotted line is the average of six previous recessions. What this shows is that in the previous recession we had significant job loss, just like we did in this recession, only the job loss in this recession has been a little steeper. However, in the past when we came back out of the recession, we moved rather quickly to recover the jobs that had been lost. So in the average of the six previous recessions, by 2 years after the downturn began, the jobs lost had been recovered. In contrast, in this recession the job loss has continued at this low level.

We are not recovering these jobs. In fact, we asked the Labor Department this morning what percent of jobs had been recovered in previous recessions. Fourteen months from the bottom of the downturn in previous recessions in the postwar period, we had recovered 174 percent of the jobs, 128 percent, 132 percent, 169 percent, 244 percent, 191 percent, 151 percent, and 139 percent. In other words, in every instance we had recovered more jobs than had been lost during the recession, in some instances by very significant margins. In this recession, we have recovered 9 percent—9 percent of the jobs have been recovered in this recession.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would advise the Senator that morning business, under the previous unanimous-consent agreement, was extended until 10:45, so we would need a request for that.

Mr. SARBANES. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for another 5 minutes in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, since January 1989, there has been a net loss of 82,000 jobs in the private sector. People are losing work. They are unable to find work. The number of long-term unemployed has now risen well above 2 million people. These are people out of work for 27 weeks or longer. When this recession started, we had 600,000 such people. We are now well above 2 million.

In an interview with the New York Times last week, the President said, and I quote him: "I happen to think the economy is better than most people in America think."

I want to repeat that quote last week by the President: "I happen to think the economy is better than most people in America think."

Today's labor market data confirm that most people in America have a better read on the state of the economy than the President of the United States. I hope this mounting evidence of economic deterioration will send a wakeup call to the White House, which needs to take concrete steps to address our economic situation rather than continuing to blame people for seeing all too clearly the sad state of our economy.

The Labor Department gives each month the unemployment figures for the 11 largest States in the country: California, Florida, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Texas, States in every major concentration of population in the Nation. The unemployment rate this month has risen in 10 of those 11 States, in some instances by more than 1 point. New York State has gone from 7.9 to 9.2; California, from 8.7 to 9.5. Only in Pennsylvania it dropped two-tenths of a point.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes.

Mr. RIEGLE. If you look across the country, as you say, in Florida, it jumped up to 8½ percent; Illinois, 8.6 percent; Massachusetts, 8.8 percent; Michigan, my home State, 8.8 percent—we have 404,000 people unemployed there; North Carolina jumped up 6.5 percent; Ohio, up 7.6 percent.

But if I can go back to your other chart here just for 1 minute. You see what is happening here too with this current recession, we are starting to go into a triple dip in this recession. As this line turns back down, which is what today's data is showing us, we are seeing this huge mass of unemployed people getting larger.

This problem is getting worse and the administration, as you say, is sleepwalking. There is no response to this problem. The President either does not think there is a problem or thinks the problem is going away on its own. The problem is getting worse. The problem is getting worse.

I thank the Senator from Maryland for focusing on this issue.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is exactly right. The first thing the President needs to do is he needs to announce this morning that he supports the extension of the unemployment compensation bill that is pending in the Congress——

Mr. RIEGLE. Exactly.

Mr. SARBANES [continuing]. Which he has indicated, unfortunately, tragically, disastrously for millions of people, that he is thinking about vetoing.

Look at the increase in the number of long-term unemployed, people out of work for 27 weeks or longer. The President ought to send a clear message that he is prepared to sign the bill. The number of long-term unemployed surged 10 percent in 1 month, from May to June. It is getting up in the range of approaching quadrupling since this recession began.

These are people out of work for 27 weeks or longer who desperately need these extended unemployment benefits. The President is saying I happen to think the economy is better than most people in America think.

Well, most people in America know better than the President. They know what is happening out there on the street and how much they are hurting. These are disastrous figures, Mr. President.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield at that point?

He was citing some of the job reductions and job eliminations announced just this week from Hughes Aircraft, from Aetna Life Insurance. The Alcoa Co. announced it is eliminating 2,100 jobs; Northwest Airlines, 350 jobs.

Here is a story out of yesterday's Wall Street Journal, page 2 in the Wall Street Journal. It says the oil industry in America is expected to lose 50,000 jobs this year. It says that is happening because of the acceleration of exploration spending overseas.

So, here are another 50,000 jobs that are going to disappear between now and the end of the year that have to be added to these totals.

We have to have an emergency job strategy to get people in America back to work. People cannot support their families. They are losing their homes. They are losing their cars.

The other night on national television there was a picture of two Desert Storm veterans, who were wearing the uniform of this country a year ago, fighting in that war. They have now come home. They are unemployed. They are homeless and living in cardboard boxes in this city.

We cannot tolerate this situation, and the President has to wake up. We cannot have all this focus on foreign policy and helping all these countries and no plan to help America. We need help here on the job front in this country now.

Mr. SARBANES. Exactly right. And the President needs to recognize it. He needs to take action, and the first thing the President needs to do—and he should do it this morning—is indicate his strong support for the passage of the extended unemployment compensation insurance legislation before the Congress. These figures, Mr. President, are grim. They really are an economic disaster for the Nation.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OIL INDUSTRY IS SEEN LOSING 50,000 JOBS IN THE UNITED STATES AS COMPANIES EXPAND OVERSEAS

(By Caleb Solomon)

HOUSTON.—The oil industry will lose as many as 50,000 U.S. jobs this year as it accelerates exploration spending overseas, a leading energy executive predicted.

Last year, oil companies increased their exploration and development spending outside the U.S. by 27 percent to $31.4 billion, according to an Arthur Andersen & Co. survey of 241 publicly held oil companies, mostly based in the U.S. U.S. spending slid 4 percent to $17.7 billion, the study finds.

Victor Burk, managing director of the accounting firm's oil practice, said the expected drop in domestic employment comes on top of a loss of about 50,000 oil jobs last year. "Unfortunately," he said, "global trends have resulted in job losses in the U.S."

As of January, about 369,500 people worked in the exploration, production or development segments of the domestic oil business, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. A loss of 50,000 jobs this year would represent a drop of nearly 14 percent.

Although most of the lost jobs are in Texas, Louisiana and Oklahoma, economists said the shrinkage won't disrupt the region's economy as much as it once would have. "It hurts, but it's not fatal because we've shed so much of the energy industry already," said Bernard Weinstein, director of the Center for Economic Development and Research at the University of North Texas in Denton.

"The oil industry isn't the 500-pound gorilla it once was, but it is still big enough to hurt," said Bill Gilmer, senior economist at the Federal Reserve in Houston. "We will be fortunate because of the oil and gas downturn to match the nation's economic growth in the coming year."

Mr. Weinstein said that a decade ago about 25 percent of this region's economy was energy-related. But after the energy crash of the 1980s, he said, the ratio is closer to 10 percent today. "One of the results of the energy busts is that we've become much more like the rest of the country," Mr. Weinstein said.

He predicted that as the rest of the country recovers, so will this part of the Southwest, with some exceptions. For instance, Houston, the nation's oil capital, will suffer the most from the oil-industry layoffs and will trail the upturn in the state, he said. Houston's oil-service businesses began hiring more people in late 1989 in anticipation of a drilling boom that never materialized, Mr. Gilmer said. Employment peaked last summer and has been falling since then.

The shift to overseas oil drilling has been under way for some time, as the industry believes it has better prospects for large discoveries outside the U.S. Oil company spending abroad has grown at an average of more than 20 percent annually over the past five years, the Arthur Anderson survey found.

It was the severe decline in natural gas prices last winter, however, that hastened the decline in jobs and a plunge in drilling activity. A record low rig count of 596, a measure of the number of wells being drilled, was hit in the week ended June 12. Oil-service company Baker Hughes Inc., which keeps the count, said that in the latest week, which ended Friday, 645 rigs were working, down 27 percent from a year earlier and a small fraction of the more than 4,500 rigs that were working at one point in the early 1980s.

"This will be the low year in domestic drilling," said Isaac Kerridge, a Baker Hughes economist. Mr. Kerridge said drilling activity could rise 7 to 10 percent next year if natural gas prices continue their recent uptrend and if smaller exploration companies get some tax relief from the energy bill working its way through Congress.

But pleas for help have generally fallen on deaf ears in Washington. "I testify before Congress, and the Yankees just beat up on you," Mr. Weinstein said. "Their concept is the cheaper [the energy], the better."

THE 1992 ELLIS ISLAND MEDAL OF HONOR

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, ours has always been a nation of opportunity and freedom, a land where hard work and determination were more important than social standing. This is the image that has drawn millions of immigrants to our Nation. And the contributions of immigrants, in turn, have made our Nation the beacon of promise and hope that America symbolizes for the world.

It is vital for our Nation to remember and recognize its roots. It is important to honor those who embody the ideals that inspired millions of people from all regions of the world to leave their homelands in search of a better life—a life where only ability and hard work mattered.

That is the purpose behind the Ellis Island Medals of Honor.

This year's 100 recipients represent a variety of ethnic backgrounds and have succeeded in a wide range of professions. Their accomplishments are a credit to each of them, but equally, their accomplishments are a modern-day guide to the possibilities of America today.

I am pleased to take particular note that three of our colleagues—Senators BIDEN, THURMOND, and HOLLINGS—were honored this year.

Senator BIDEN's chairmanship of the Senate Judiciary Committee makes him today in a special sense the particular guardian of our Constitution for the U.S. Senate. Those issues and responsibilities which under the Constitution fall within the jurisdiction of the Senate—and those special responsibilities for which his committee is responsible—touch on some of the most fundamental structures of our Government, and reach to the very heart of our system of representative democracy.

Senator BIDEN has always discharged his duty as chairman with a strong sense of the particular responsibility he has to pass on to the future a constitutional structure undamaged and undeformed by partisan and passing electoral politics.

He has sought to serve both the institution of the Senate itself and the Constitution as well with the stewardship that both deserve. He has succeeded.

There can be no more challenging an assignment for any American citizen, whether newly sworn in, first generation or the representative of a line of early settlers, than to know that the building blocks of American liberty rest in his care.

Adding to the challenge, Senator BIDEN has the satisfaction of knowing that in his care, the foundations of our liberty have been well and staunchly preserved.

The State of South Carolina has particular reason to be proud. This year, both of its Senators received Ellis Island Medals of Honor. South Carolina, as one of the Thirteen Original Colonies, subscribed to the American ideals of innovation, hard work, and independence from the inception of our Nation. These ideals are well represented by Senators THURMOND and HOLLINGS. They have served South Carolina and the Nation with integrity. It is only fitting that they be recognized for their efforts, accomplishments, and dedication.

The honor bestowed upon our colleagues and the other recipients of the Ellis Island Medals of Honor is a reminder to all Americans that, although the freedoms which make America a special and unique Nation are enshrined in the Constitution, without the dedication of the people of our Nation to these ideals, our Constitution would be nothing but hollow promises. The lives and accomplishments of the recipients suggest that protection and dedication to the Constitution and the liberties it protects are a permanent and enduring duty of all who come into this world or into this Nation to bear the proud title of American citizen.

Senators BIDEN, THURMOND, and HOLLINGS, as well as all of the recipients of the 1992 Ellis Island Medals of Honor, deserve our recognition and thanks for their dedication to promoting American ideals. I ask that the names of all recipients appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the names were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALUTING TENANTS AT THE BERKELEY HEIGHTS HOUSING COMPLEX, WATERBURY, CT

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to salute the tenants council at the Berkeley Heights public housing project in the city of Waterbury in my home State of Connecticut. The tenants council and other concerned residents at the project have been working hard to improve their neighborhood and, with the help of the Waterbury Housing Authority and the regional HUD office, they recently concluded a successful effort to implement renovations and improvements.

The Berkeley Heights public housing project is a 40-year-old complex which consists of about 336 units. Like many housing projects around the country, it has experienced some problems over the years. Many of the buildings have deteriorated and are in need of substantial rehabilitation. In recent years, the residents have also been victimized by drug traffickers.

About 10 years ago, several concerned tenants formed the Berkeley Heights Tenants Council as a means of fighting the problems in the community. And during the last year, the tenants council has made great progress toward organizing and empowering the tenants. That progress was demonstrated in the council's role in the recent renovation of Berkeley Heights.

As originally planned, the renovation was designed to eliminate common hallways with the hope that drug traffic would decrease. Fortunately, several problems developed during the renovation process—some of the apartments were reduced in size and several windows and sprinkler systems were eliminated.

Fortunately, the tenants council took the initiative and attempted to correct the problems. They obtained an architect and worked to redesign the renovation plans. After much diligent work, the council reached an agreement with the Waterbury Housing Authority and the regional HUD office whereby most of the tenants recommendations were incorporated into the renovations.

The following tenants played an instrumental role in this process: The president of the council, Arthur Jones, Mrs. Arthur Jones, vice president, Bernice Walker, secretary Audrey Ellis, treasurer Gloria Brown, Tina Jackson, and Ruth Ann Barnett. I am pleased that my office was able to assist the tenants with the negotiations and their endeavor to create a better neighborhood.

Mr. President, the efforts of the Berkeley Heights Tenants Council serve as a reminder of what people can accomplish when they work toward a common goal. Although there are fundamental problems in many housing projects across this country, it is important to remember that there are also many hard-working and law-abiding citizens living in those projects who care very deeply about their neighborhood—citizens like the concerned residents of Berkeley Heights who joined together to improve their community. Again, I salute those residents and look forward to working with them in the future.

MAKE WAY FOR THE SUPERTRAINS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, Senator SYMMS has contributed a rollicking good piece to Monday's Roll Call called "Make Way for the Supertrains." The Senator, or course, was coauthor and floor manager of last year's Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act, or ICE-TEA as it is now generally known. This was no small undertaking. ISTEA signaled the end of the Interstate Highway era, the system having been completed, and the beginning of an era of innovation in old and new transportation technologies.

From the first, Senator SYMMS insisted that high speed rail, an old technology if you like but with wondrous new features, be specifically included in the legislation's stated objectives. He persuaded the Senate, the House, the President. In Roll Call he now lays out a plan for getting on with it.

I hope you will share his enthusiasm, as I surely do. If a New Yorker may boast a bit, we once led the world in these things. In 1893, in the West Albany shops of the New York Central, they turned out the finest railroad engine ever built. The 999. On the tenth of May, in Syracuse, she was hitched up to the Empire State Express for the 150 mile run to Buffalo.

In the words of a railroad historian:

> The platform was crowded as the train pulled out. Word had gone forth that this day there was to be a race to command the admiration of the gods.

And so it was. On the final stretch from Batavia to Buffalo, one of the miles was covered at the astonishing rate of 112½ miles per hour: The fastest man had ever moved. In an instant, the engineer, Charles H. Hogan, and the 999 became world famous. And it wasn't the only record broken that day. In those few minutes Charlie Hogan's hair had changed from deep brown to snowy white.

The celebrated Japanese bullet train runs from Tokyo to Osaka at somewhat better speed than the old 999, but not much. Ditto the French Train a Grand Vitesse [TGV] now running from Paris to Lyon. Clearly we can do as much or more.

But will we get on with the job? STEVE SYMMS, of course, is a Rocky Mountain man. Starting in 1883, J.J. Hill built the Great Northern Railway across the Rockies through Sandpoint, ID, in 10 years' time. These days it would take us that long to decide to have a meeting on the subject. Unless, that is, we listen to Senator SYMMS and show that Americans can still build railroads.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Senator SYMMS' article from Roll Call be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Roll Call, June 29, 1992]

MAKE WAY FOR THE SUPERTRAINS

(By Senator Steve Symms)

In 20 years of politics, I have never spent as much time in the favored company of environmentalists, historical preservationists, land use planners, and the like as I have since beginning my legislative efforts to see that high-speed rail becomes part of America's transportation network.

Japan's bullet trains were previewed nearly 30 years ago, the French TGV has carried passengers—24 million in 1989—for more than a decade, and other industrialized nations have had years of experience with high-speed rail.

Yet in the US, these supertrains are still thought to be the domain of utopian dreamers whose concern for issues such as world peace and the plight of snail darters overwhelms any thought of free market principles or the financial bottom line.

Supertrains—steel-wheel trains traveling 150 to 300 mph—are not the product of a fanciful imagination. They are a tried and true technology that reduces traffic congestion, energy consumption, and pollution. And for the business traveler, supertrains can be a competitive, convenient alternative to air transportation because they depart and arrive downtown, avoiding the airport push.

And unlike other "good ideas" whose time has not quite come, a high-speed rail system can be operated at a profit.

In his recent book, Supertrains Joseph Vranich notes that in 1987, TGV's Southeast Line collected $737.5 million in revenues, had $291 million in direct expenses, and the remaining $446.5 million covered interest on the debt that funded the project, depreciation of the trains, a reserve for future track upgrades, a payment to French National Railways for administrative costs, and a payment on the loan principal.

Other high-speed rail systems—the German ICE trains and the Japanese bullet trains—receive more direct and substantial government subsidies, and profits are harder to document, although Mr. Vranich observes that every year since 1975 the Tokyo-Osaka line has earned a profit, and its construction loans were paid off in the 1970s.

But is the successful experience with high-speed rail in other countries indicative of what the market would bear in the US? I think it is, given the right mix of population, distance between cities, and economic conditions. And more importantly, US companies, willing to risk their own capital, think so, too.

Today, state and local officials and private investors are studying the feasibility of at least ten high-speed rail systems, including a Chicago hub system linking Minneapolis, St. Louis, and Detroit; a system linking Miami, Tampa, and Orlando; a Seattle hub system connecting Portland and Vancouver; a Pittsburgh to Philadelphia line; and a Las Vegas-Los Angeles system.

The route most likely to put high-speed rail on the map in this country, however, is a Fort Worth-Dallas-Houston-San Antonio-Austin system called Texas Supertrain. This $6.7 billion, first-of-its-kind project will be financed entirely with capital raised in the private markets and, with the exception of a few inner-city segments, will be owned and operated by a private corporation.

Are those investors risking that amount of capital because they believe in the transportation, environmental, and energy benefits to be gained with high-speed rail? In part, perhaps, but the primary motivation for this investment, like most other private ventures, is the expectation of profit. Texas Supertrain can and will be a money-making, private operation.

What will the advent of regularly scheduled high-speed rail service mean to American travelers and policymakers? There is no doubt that traffic congestion will be reduced, particularly along our most heavily traveled Interstate corridors and at certain airports.

In addition, energy consumption will be reduced because high-speed trains require approximately one-third the energy consumed by automobiles and one-quarter of that used in airplanes.

And because the trains are powered by electricity, travel by high-speed rail dramatically reduces emissions of hydrocarbons, carbon monoxide, and nitrogen oxides as compared to travel by auto or air. Indeed, my friends in the environmental community estimate that travel by high-speed rail in the Northeast Corridor would emit 70 percent less pollution than auto or air alternatives.

Reductions in energy consumption, traffic congestion, and pollution—those are goals all of us can support. However, they are benefits that will only be sustained over the long term if they're obtained at a profit.

Last year, when Congress approved the Intermodal Surface Transportation Efficiency Act (legislation I am proud to have co-authored), we declared it to be our national policy to develop a transportation system "that is economically efficient, environmentally sound, provides the foundation for the nation to compete in the global economy, and moves people and goods in an energy efficient manner."

It's a pretty tall order. But supertrains are one important means for us to get there from here.

TEODORO MOSCOSO

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to bring to my colleagues' attention the passing of Teodoro Moscoso of Puerto Rico, a hero of his Commonwealth and a proud public servant. His death last month in San Juan at the age of 81 marked the end of an extraordinary political life.

I came to know Teodoro Moscoso some 30 years ago when, as an Assistant Secretary of Labor, I became involved with the Alliance For Progress, as President Kennedy had proclaimed it. I traveled in Latin America in the company of Moscoso, the coordinator of the program, and his associates, and learned their views on the matters most important to the region. I spoke in countries as diverse as Colombia and Brazil about our relationship with Puerto Rico. I would say, well, here, let Ted Moscoso describe the matter to you. He will be more authoritative than I, and more informed than I. And he was.

What Ted Moscoso may best be remembered for is Operation Boostrap, an industrial development program which he headed in the 1950's. It was designed by Fomento, the Puerto Rican Government agency responsible for development, to stimulate creation of a manufacturing base for the Commonwealth's economy. Under Moscoso, it became the force behind the transformation of an impoverished island into a thriving Caribbean center of trade and commerce. At its height, one factory was established every day on the island. Per capita income skyrocketed. The program was a spectacular success, and made Moscoso one of the most sought after consultants on Third World economic development. David F. Ross, in his book "The Long Uphill Path," an historical study of Puerto Rico's Program of Economic Development, writes that, "it is impossible to estimate how different the program's results would have been if its direction had been assigned to another man than Teodoro Moscoso, or if Moscoso had not remained at its head throughout its difficult formative years." Well, it is hard to imagine it could have been any better or more successful.

Mr. President, Teodoro Moscoso will be missed by the people of Puerto Rico and by many friends in this country, for he showed such devotion to both. He was deeply committed to strengthening the bonds between his Commonwealth and the mainland, and we are all the better for it. Mr. President, I ask that the text of Teodoro Moscoso's obituary from the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the obituary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 17, 1992]

TEODORO MOSCOSO DIES; GUIDED PUERTO RICO'S INDUSTRIALIZATION

SAN JUAN, PR.—Teodoro Moscoso, 81, architect of Puerto Rico's Operation Bootstrap industrialization program and a former Kennedy administration official, died of cancer June 15 at his home here.

He is credited with helping transform the once-impoverished island into a manufacturing and business center of the Caribbean. He helped create the Puerto Rico Industrial Development Co. In 1942, then directed the organization, which spearheaded the drive to bring manufacturing to the island.

The program became known as Operation Bootstrap because of its success in luring manufacturing plants to the U.S. commonwealth and raising the standard of living for residents. In 1942, there were 10 factories on the island, compared with the more than 2,000 factories now in operation that produce textiles, pharmaceuticals, electronics and other items.

During the administration of President Kennedy, he served as U.S. ambassador to Venezuela and as administrator of the Alliance for Progress.

Between 1950 and 1961, Mr. Moscoso headed Puerto Rico's Economic Development Organization, also known as Fomento, which promoted industrial development abroad.

He returned to Fomento from 1973 through 1976 at the request of Gov. Rafael Hernandez Colon. Most recently, Mr. Moscoso, was a member of the board of directors of Banco Santander Puerto Rico and was involved in efforts to promote exports of Puerto Rican agricultural products.

Mr. Moscoso was a pharmacy graduate of the University of Michigan and was in the drugstore business before entering public service

POWER PROJECTION AND ROLES AND MISSIONS

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I believe that Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER did the United States a distinct service today in raising the need for a comprehensive reexamination of our present roles and missions. We cannot simply continue reducing our forces and defense expenditures because the cold war has ended. We must reshape our strategy, our forces, our roles and missions, and our defense spending programs to suit the new and often troubled world we live in.

I intend to discuss this issue in some depth once we return from our coming recess. I do want, however, to call my colleagues attention to a letter that I have written Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER on this subject, and which addresses the need to couple our examination of future roles and missions to a power projection strategy and strong power projection forces. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this letter be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, this letter focuses on the need to ensure that three critical power projection programs—the A-X, the F/A-18E/F, and the CVN-76—are fully funded in the fiscal year 1993 Defense authorization and Defense Appropriations Act. Like Senator WARNER, I want to make certain that we do not confuse the need to conduct a comprehensive reexamination of our roles and missions with the ability to prejudge that reexamination by taking dramatic action to alter President Bush's budget request by cutting critical procurement programs.

We also need to understand that far more is involved than the issue of which service should have a given mix of roles and missions. THe task we face is to decide on a long-term defense program extending beyond the year 2000 that converts our present cold war force posture to one suited to the new world we live in.

This means reexamining every aspect of our force posture to see if we have adequate power projection forces, as well as reexamining it to see where we may have surplus forces tailored to the needs of the cold war.

For example, I believe we can make the massive cuts in nuclear forces that President Bush has made possible through his negotiations with President Yeltsin. At the same time, I believe that we must also buy modern strategic airlift in the form of the C-17, and buy the prepositioning ships and fast sealift that we lacked during Desert Storm.

I believe we can cap long-range bomber production, but I believe we must reexamine our entire tactical air posture to see if our presently planned force mix is large enough, and modern enough, to compensate for the cuts we are making in overall force levels. The issue is not simply one of which service operates which aircraft, it is one of overall sufficiency, and long before we examine trade-offs between bombers and medium attack aircraft, or Air Force and Navy/Marine aircraft, we should examine whether we need both.

We need to remember that for nearly three decades we have never attempted to size our total forces to meet all of the conventional war fighting requirements posed by the cold war, and that we made major compromises in the readiness and capability of our power projection forces to allow us to provide forces for NATO.

This became all too clear during the war in the gulf. We not only lacked strategic airlift and sealift, we lacked a mix of rapidly deployable Marine and Army forces to fight a medium intensity conflict. Only Saddam Hussein's willingness to wait for 5 months, the rapid response of our allies and the United Nations, and our ability to restructure and deploy forces for NATO, allowed us to win Desert Storm with such speed, with such decisiveness, and so few American casualties.

This is why I believe we should be very careful about making any tradeoffs between the three Marine Expeditionary Forces, MEF's, and five Army contingency divisions before we determine whether eight such divisions are enough. It is why I believe that we must examine the need for heavier overall force mixes, able to fight in an environment involving the possible use of weapons of mass destruction, thousands of tanks, and hundreds of modern combat aircraft. It is why we must comprehensively reexamine the need for readiness and sustainability, and whether we are creating a new form of hollow military by our constant cuts in operations and maintenance funding.

We also need to reexamine the need for forward deployment and forward presence in an area where most of the threats we face are threats in regions like Asia, the Mediterranean, and the gulf, or in distant corners of the world where we cannot predict the moment at which we will suddenly face a threat to United States citizens and interests. We must recognize that history does not end, but reasserts itself, and that new threats develop.

We must recognize that we have used our military forces to secure our interests more than 240 times since World War II, and that in virtually every case, our planning guidance failed to predict the need for such deployments, we lacked strategic warning, and we had to act in contingencies far from our borders that had nothing to do with the former Soviet Union or Warsaw Pact. The only thing more dangerous than forgetting the past, is acting as if we could firmly predict the future.

Let me conclude, Mr. President, by noting that this is why we must tailor our examination of our future force needs, and roles and missions, to allow flexibility. We have no way today to know if we will need fewer forces or more forces 5 or 10 years from now. We have no way to know exactly what level of technical superiority we will need over our potential enemies.

If we cut major programs and force elements without leaving ourselves suitable flexibility, we will lose capabilities that take years and immense amounts of money to rebuild. All of our short-term savings may vanish in a single crisis and be offset by much higher price tags in dollars, lives, war, and aggression.

As I say in my letter to Senator NUNN, we are in a critical transition year. During the last few years, we have been able to make cuts in our defense forces and expenditures because of the end of the cold war without fully examining whether we will have sufficient forces for the post-cold war era. The House Armed Services Committee and House Appropriations Committee, however, have already proposed cuts in the fiscal year 1993 defense budget that could put us on a path where we give up resources that will be critical to our future needs.

We must not repeat our experience after World War II, after Korea, and after Vietnam. We must not rush to cut our capabilities—sacrificing strength, readiness, and our men and women in uniform—only to have to spend far more in the long run. We must also remember that in national defense, cost-effectiveness is measured in lives and hopes, not simply in dollars. Accordingly, I believe that we should move forward with our critical power projection programs, and only cut them if a comprehensive examination of our global position, the risks we run, and our overall force posture indicates that we live in a far safer world than I believe now exists.

EXHIBIT 1

JUNE 30, 1992.

Senator SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR NUNN: During last week's meeting on the mark-up of the fiscal year 1993 Defense Authorization Act you raised the issue of the need to reexamine the traditional roles and missions of our military forces in a Post Cold War world. You also noted that making the correct shifts in roles and missions might be the key to the kind of major shifts in defense spending that might either lead to an increased peace dividend or major increases in the effectiveness of our forces.

Your speech today on roles and missions raised further issues, outlining a number of possible trade-offs and economies. You also raised a number of important examples of areas where we need to standardize our capabilities, and where we may benefit from creating integrated capabilities or capabilities managed by a single service.

EXAMINING ROLES AND MISSIONS

I too believe that a reexamination of our present roles and missions is necessary. As you know, I suggested the changes to the fiscal year 1991 Defense Authorization Act that called for a mission budget covering the FYDP to be submitted along with the regular input budget. I am working with your staff and Senator Warner's staff to move this effort forward, and to ensure that we have the kind of planning, programming, and budgeting data that is essential to a review of roles and missions that can be linked to both strategy and major force planning decisions.

Before you and Senator Warner spoke, I had already asked Senator Warner to consider legislation that would ask the Secretary of Defense to forward an annual roles and mission report based on the Chairman's report required as part of Goldwater-Nichols.

I am concerned, however, that we do not prejudice critical force improvements by delaying them, or making premature trade-offs, before the Department of Defense completes its examination of future roles and missions, and before we have comprehensively examined the possible force mixes that might result.

I am also concerned that we do not focus our examination of roles and missions simply on trade-offs between the military services, or an effort to create minimal acceptable capabilities at a minimal cost. The key issue we face is to reshape our force posture to meet the needs of the post cold war era with a level of forces and defense expenditure that we can sustain. The issue of roles and missions is an important subset of issues, but it is only a subset.

As you know, I believe that any such adjustment of the Base Force and our present roles and missions must be based on a shift from a NATO-centered strategy based on a prolonged conventional war in Europe to a power projection strategy based on the ability to use land, naval, marine, and air forces to deal with low and medium intensity crises throughout the world.

Such a strategy requires us to maintain our current edge in both land and sea based tactical aviation, and I believe that we can only do this if we move forward with the F-22, the A-X for both the Air Force and Navy, and the A/F-18E/F. It requires us to have both a modernized bomber force and a modern carrier force. It requires both the C-17 and fast sealift, and it requires both a fully ready Marine force of three full MEFs, and a fully ready U.S. Army contingency force of at least five divisions.

We have already discussed a number of these issues in this year's Committee and Subcommittee meetings, but I believe that we may not have examined three programs that are critical to implementing such a strategy in sufficient depth. These programs are the A-X, the F-18E/F, and the need for a new nuclear carrier. I would like both you and my other colleagues on the Armed Services Committee to know my views on these issues before we go to mark-up.

THE A-X

Let me begin with the A-X. I believe that we must be extremely careful not to force trade-offs between advanced attack aircraft and our bomber force decades before we can predict the future nature of the threats we face. We learned in August, 1990—as we learned in Korea—that we cannot afford to shape our forces as if we were prophets. We learned in the months that followed that airpower can play an extraordinarily important role in hurling back aggression and in limiting our casualties—provided that we have an absolute and decisive superiority over the enemy.

Now that we have cancelled production of the F-15E, the A-X is the only practical road to an advanced medium attack aircraft that either the Air Force or Navy can deploy during the next quarter century. While the Air Force and Navy can retain and improve the F-111 and A-6, we also have learned from the conduct of war study that our existing attack fighters were less effective than we thought and had problems in survivability, range-payload, and their ability to deliver advanced conventional munitions.

The A-X will offer major advantages over both the F-111 and A-6—which will be as much as 42 years old by the time the first A-X squadron is active with the Navy or Air Force. The A-6 and F-111 will average 25 years of service, and even the best mix of upgrades of the F-111 and A-6 cannot prepare these aircraft for the complex threat environment that will then exist in many Third World nations—both in terms of air defense and the need to find and kill highly mobile targets.

The need for the A-X is particularly striking when we consider the following shifts in our strategic posture:

Our ability to deploy sheer numbers in terms of naval, land, and air forces will be sharply reduced.

Our deterrent capabilities in many contingencies will be dependent on the perception of a given threat that we can repeat and improve on our performance in Desert Storm.

The willingness of the UN, and our friends and allies, to support the U.S. in peace keeping and peace making, and in deterring and ending aggression will be heavily dependent on their perception of our strength.

Our ability to develop a domestic political consensus around military action will depend heavily on our ability to maintain a decisive edge over potential threats that ensures low U.S. and allied casualties. It will also depend on having highly flexible strike systems that minimize damage to civilians and even enemy casualties.

Our capability to limit escalation, the endurance of conflicts, and termination conflicts on favorable terms will be heavily dependent on our tactical airpower.

Our strategic posture will be highly dependent on our presence in every threatened area of the world, and the knowledge that we are both present in a troubled region and able to deploy sustained amounts of military power. We must never forget that Saudi Arabia and Israel are the only two countries in the world—outside the Central Region of Europe—which could offer the mix of sheltered, advanced, interoperable air bases we used during Desert Storm.

In most scenarios we will only be able to project air power effectively if we can maintain high sustained sortie rates, if we can rapidly retarget and strike at mobile targets, and if our most advanced attack fighters have sufficient range and payload to operate at long ranges or in extremely demanding missions.

I do not believe, as members of the House Armed Services Committee seem to believe, that we can accelerate development of the A-X. The F-22 will involve a thirteen year development cycle, and our experience with the A-12 has shown that we need a period of 10 years to bring this aircraft to the point where it can become the kind of aircraft that can fully meet the needs of the Navy and Air Force during the next decade, and dominate the skies of the period after 2000.

At the same time, I see no possibility that we can sacrifice the critical air and power projection superiority that only an A-X can provide by relying on older long range strike fighters like the F-111 and A-6, or a comparatively small force of B-1B and B-2B bombers. We must have an all-weather, all-environment medium attack aircraft.

More broadly, I see no current possibility that we can shift to a mix of roles and missions where we can rely on long range bombers as a substitute for advanced long range attack aircraft. We need both, but all of our experience with air combat to date has indicated that it is the flexibility of advanced attack aircraft that is critical in the kind of low and mid intensity combat we face in the future.

THE F/A-18E/F

I am all too conscious of the troubled history of naval aviation in recent years. I believe, however, that the Navy has demonstrated to the Congress that it has developed an effective plan for the modernization of naval aviation, and that the F/A-18E/F is a critical part of this plan.

If the Navy can control the cost of this program in constant dollars, and keep development within the current program development cost of $4.88 billion, it should be able to buy 48 F/A-18 C/D aircraft in the fiscal year 1993 budget, and to develop the F/A-18E/F as a relatively low cost upgrade to a proven system. This would ensure that we develop a high-low mix of aircraft where the F/A-18E/F both complements the A-X and can meet the navy's needs in many contingencies.

Once again, I do not believe that the House Armed Services Committee is right in attempting to restructure the Secretary of Defense's budget request. I agree with my House colleagues to the extent that we must give priority to the A-X in meeting our most probable future mission requirements in an era of declining real defense spending and uncertain threats. At the same time, the F/A-18E/F should be affordable if we avoid competitive prototyping.

It will only cost about half as much as developing a new type of aircraft, and promises a 35 percent increase in range and 50 percent increase in endurance over the F/A-18C/D. It offers an 80 percent increase in time-on-station in some key mission contingencies, and a 25 percent increase in combat air patrol station coverage. It has superior payload flexibility and recovery capability, and it will provide improved survivability in terms of reduced vulnerable area, increased expendables, and improved electronic countermeasures.

THE CVN-76

Finally, I believe that we should fully fund the Navy's request for $832 billion for advanced construction of the new CVN-76. As we examine our future roles and missions, we must not confuse unproven theory with proven practice, or research with reality. The U.S. has responded to crises in the world nearly 100 times since 1966. In 95 out of these 96 contingencies, we employed U.S. naval forces and in 75 contingencies we deployed the carrier—just as we are off the coast of Yugoslavia today. Since 1985, we have used our carriers in 31 contingencies—none involving the former Soviet Union or Warsaw Pact nations.

Each one of our carriers can support over 140 combat sorties per day, more sorties than the entire bomber force if we carry out every planned improvement in the B-1B and complete the B-2. Roughly 120 of these sorties will be attack sorties, and in many contingencies, carrier air defense aircraft like the F-14 will be able to provide air defense coverage over the battlefield.

Let me again stress, that carriers and the bomber force are complementary assets in a world where our ability to deter war, and our ability to halt or throw back aggression will be very different from our present capabilities. We will have sharply cut our ground forces, and use of nuclear weapons will be unthinkable.

As a result, we cannot ignore the fact that even today, the attack forces of two carriers can deliver as much payload over a 30 day period as our entire projected bomber force. This means a strong, modern, forward deployed carrier force and a strong bomber force are the essential elements of keeping the United States a superpower in a world that will have no other nation that is capable of preserving peace and democracy.

I believe that it is premature to plan for a force smaller than 12 carriers, but even if we do plan for a smaller force, we still need to begin work on the CVN-76 now to ensure we can cost-effectively modernize our carrier force. If we act now, we can obtain the CVN-76 for an estimated cost of $4.8 billion. If we delay for one year, the decline in our industrial base and changes in contracts will raise our costs to $5.2 billion. If we delay two years, the cost will reach $5.55 billion, and $6.0 billion if delayed three years. This is a savings of $400 million, $750 million, or $1.2 billion—depending on the timeliness of our action.

I do not believe we should fund any defense program simply to preserve jobs. Nevertheless, we are talking about some 120,000 defense jobs at a time our economy is only beginning to recover, and critical damage to the nuclear industrial base we really need.

We also need to remember two basic facts. First, our present carrier force was not sized to fight Russia or the Warsaw Pact. Over the years, the Department of Defense consistently found that it would take a total of 20–25 carriers to meet our requirements for such a contingency. It has instead been sized as the minimum force that will allow a sustained forward presence in Asia, the Mediterranean, and Gulf and provide additional contingency capability.

Second, all carriers are not alike. Our oldest carriers are 36 years old, and we face the prospect of block obsolesence during 2003–2007. Even if we cut our carrier forces, the CVN-76 will provide critical improvements in speed and survivability that our older carriers lack.

If we compare the CVN-76 to old conventional carriers like the Kitty Hawk, Constellation, and Kennedy—all of which should retire in the early 2000's—it will have more deck spots and be able to sustain higher sorties rates. It will have far more sophisticated sensor and battle management systems, and be far more capable of operating in difficult combat environments and in close cooperation with other services. It will provide 90 percent more aviation fuel storage and 50 percent more ammunition storage. It will be much faster in deployment, and have much more capability to sustain itself once deployed.

FUTURE ROLES AND MISSIONS

Let me conclude, by again expressing my support for your effort to reexamine roles and missions. I believe that we do need to reexamine both our roles and missions if we are to create the power projection strategy we need. I also believe that we should begin a debate next year over all of the major programs and force levels necessary to implement each role and mission.

I do not believe that we should follow in the footsteps of the House Armed Services Committee and try to advance our own program before we have finished the review of roles and missions you call for, and fully examine the programs and force plans involved. No matter how we approach this issue, we must do it with all the thoroughness and deliberation that has characterized our operations in the past.

We are in a critical transition year. During the last few years, we have been able to make cuts in our defense forces and expenditures because of the end of the Cold War without fully examining whether we will have sufficient forces for the post-Cold War era. The House Armed Services Committee and House Appropriations Committee, however, have already proposed cuts in the FY1993 defense budget that could put us on a path where we give up resources that will be critical to our future needs.

We must not repeat our experience after World War II, after Korea, and after Vietnam. We must not rush to cut our capabilities—sacrificing strength, readiness, and our men and women in uniform—only to have to spend far more in the long run. We must also remember that in national defense, cost-effectiveness is measured in lives and hopes, not simply in dollars. Accordingly, I believe that we should move forward with our critical power projection programs, and only cut them if a comprehensive examination of our global position, the risks we run, and our overall force posture indicates that we live in a far safer world than I believe now exists.

Sincerely,

JOHN MCCAIN,
U.S. Senator.

ENTERPRISE ZONES

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, in the near future the Senate will turn to the consideration of various legislative proposals relating to the establishment of enterprise zones. For the past several weeks much attention has been given to the debate over the types of incentives which should be included in such a bill and how and where such zones should be designated.

Last week the House Ways and Means Committee marked up legislation which provided for 25 urban and 25 rural zones. That bill came under widespread criticism for the types of tax incentives which were included as well as for the manner in which the zones were divided.

This morning we were greeted with the news that the White House and bipartisan House leaders had reached an agreement on long-term urban aid, including enterprise zones. I have not had the opportunity to review the agreement, but according to the Washington Post, the enterprise zone portion of the agreement provides for 50 enterprise zones to be evenly divided between urban and rural areas. While I will reserve final judgment until I see the entire House package, I have a disturbing feeling that the package does little to address the severe problems of unemployment and poverty on Indian reservations.

I would point out that the version as reported by the House Ways and Means Committee did not provide for separate consideration of Indian tribal governments. Rather, the committee referred to Indian tribes in a parenthetical reference under the rural enterprise zone category by saying that at least one rural zone should be established on an Indian reservation.

Mr. President, asking 510 federally recognized Indian tribes residing in 33 States to compete for one Indian enterprise zone is absolutely ridiculous. Not only does such a policy ignore the very real human suffering occurring on Indian reservations today, but it again treats Indian people as second-class citizens.

Let me assure my colleagues that the Senate bill will receive close scrutiny by this Senator to see that the final package not only includes all Indian tribes but treats them as full and equal partners.

We must not repeat past mistakes in Federal Indian policy. Unfortunately, the action taken by the House appears to be headed in that direction. Once again we are seeking to provide Indian reservations with remedies more suited to urban and rural communities, rather than recognizing the unique circumstances of Indian reservations and the government-to-government relationship that the United States has with Indian tribal governments, including that power originating from the article I, section 8, clause 3 of the Constitution, which states that:

> The Congress shall have the power * * * to regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes.

Unfortunately, for the better part of two centuries, the Congress has so poorly exercised that authority that Federal Indian policy is infamous for its shortsightedness, inconsistency, and disruptive consequences. In the area of economic development, the Federal Government has sometimes tried to direct investment into one or another specific area of business activity on reservations—tourism was a big favorite for a while. By and large these efforts have not proven to be successful.

The reason for this failure, I believe, is that the Federal Government has tried to dictate and control the development of Indian reservation economies. Government control does not work. I've been working with Indian tribal governments for 10 years, and during that time I've learned that the policies that have been effective and produce meaningful change are those policies that have been closely coordinated with Indian tribal governments.

For the past 9 years I have been advocating the establishment of Indian enterprise zones. During that time I have worked and reworked my legislation to reflect the comments I've received from Indian leaders across the country. Today that legislation takes the form of S. 2254, the Indian Employment and Investment Act. It is my hope that we will listen to and work with Indian tribes to enact legislation in a manner that they deem beneficial to the strengthening of reservation economies. The incentives by themselves will not bring that turnaround, but I am confident that tribal leaders understand that. What tribal governments are asking for is that the Congress recognize the urgency of their situation and that it be made the basis of policy and action. If we continue to ignore the extreme poverty and despair on Indian reservations, we will have effectively banished another generation to welfare dependency.

All Indian tribal leaders are asking is that they be given the opportunity to control their own economic destiny. The Federal Government has tried and failed. Let's give Indian people the opportunity to work together with the private sector to create jobs where an average rate of 52 percent unemployment now exists. Let's provide an opportunity for small and large business to locate in areas of our country where socioeconomic problems rival and in many cases supersede what we have seen in Los Angeles.

S. 2254 was debated here in the Senate on March 12 as an amendment to the National Economic Growth Package which was later vetoed. The amendment was made subject to a point of order because it violated section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. As a result of that debate, Chairman BENTSEN agreed to the request of Senator INOUYE, Senator DOMENICI and me for a revenue estimate on the bill. I want to publicly thank the distinguished chairman for his assistance in obtaining a revenue estimate for this bill. That estimate will be helpful to us in making further refinements to S. 2254.

I look forward to working with Chairman BENTSEN and Senator PACKWOOD and other members of the Finance Committee to ensure that Indian tribes are given fair and equal consideration in the final version of any economic growth legislation that is considered here in the Senate.

It is my view that we have neglected the Native American community for too long. It should come as no surprise that as a result of our failure to adequately support the development of viable reservation economies, that Indian tribes have turned to other revenue generating activities such as gambling and the consideration of proposals to locate commercial waste facilities on their lands. What other choices have we given them?

Once again, I challenge those Members who have expressed concerns about Indian gaming and the potential for the introduction of environmentally unsound waste facilities on Indian lands to join Senator INOUYE and me in supporting tax incentives targeted to Indian reservations.

Finally, let me again state that it is absolutely critical that Indian tribal governments be included in the final Senate package as a full and equal partner. That we recognize the urgency of their situation and make it the basis of policy and action. Indian people are asking for nothing less. And I can not agree to any bill that seeks to simply throw one enterprise zone to all tribes in the hopes that they will go away.

In closing, let me repeat the words of President Peterson Zah of the Navajo Nation:

> Indeed, helping the American Indians to help themselves is neither a Democratic issue nor a Republican issue; it's not a conservative policy or a liberal policy; it's not even a "special interest" issue. Rather, it is a "human" issue that must, and deserves to be, addressed from a national perspective on a bipartisan basis, and with a real sense of urgency warranted by the deplorable conditions existing in Indian country—conditions which truly are a national disgrace.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a May 14 letter to President Bush from Senator INOUYE and I regarding this subject be inserted into the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, May 14, 1992.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the United States, the White House.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As the Congress begins its consideration of your proposals for strengthening our Nation's inner cities, we are writing to request your consideration and support for our efforts to strengthen Indian reservation economies.

Unfortunately, many of the depressed conditions you witnessed firsthand in Los Angeles are similar and, in many instances, worse on Indian reservations throughout the country today. The unemployment rate on many reservations averages 56 percent and, on some of the poorer reservations, it reaches 80 to 90 percent. A lack of jobs and economic opportunity on reservations is a major contributor to the high levels of alcoholism, high suicide rates, sense of helplessness, and other deep social problems that afflict all too many tribes.

In an effort to assist Indian tribes to alleviate these conditions, we introduced S. 2254, the Indian Employment and Investment Act of 1992. Like your proposals for the inner cities, the purpose of S. 2254 is to provide for a program of employment and investment incentives that can attract capital and make the private sector a vital and permanent source of economic development on Indian reservations.

Specifically, our bill provides for two Indian tax credits, an investment tax credit and an employment tax credit. The Indian employment tax credit provides a 10 percent credit to the employer based on the qualified wages and health insurance costs paid to an Indian who is an enrolled member of a federally recognized tribe. As an added incentive, a significantly higher employment credit of 30 percent is offered to reservation employers having an Indian work force of at least 85 percent. The credit is limited to those employees who do not receive wages in excess of $30,000. The credit, which focuses on job creation, would be allowed for the first 6 years of employment.

The Investment tax credit, for personal property, construction and physical infrastructure located on an Indian reservation, would only apply on those Indian reservations which have an unemployment rate exceeding the national average by 300 percent.

The remoteness of many Indian reservations, the lack of a skilled work force, and other economic disadvantages require that a particularly strong set of tax incentives be offered in order to succeed in attracting business to Indian reservations.

We believe for several reasons that a strategy of tax incentives such as this legislation proposes is the most effective way that the federal government can act to stimulate reservation economic development. Tax incentives do not depend for their effectiveness on the actions of federal bureaucracies that are often slow moving and unimaginative. The incentives are usable only by viable businesses that expect to earn some profits and hence to have tax obligations against which credits and deductions can be used to diminish their tax obligations. The federal government therefore does not spend anything until a real business is created on a reservation and there exist real jobs and real income generated for the benefit of reservation residents. Unlike direct spending programs, if there is no benefit, there is also no cost.

Similarly, there is a minimum of federal spending required for studies, planning, impact analyses and all the other ways in which substantial federal funds can be exhausted and yet no businesses, no jobs, and no real economic development are yet in sight. In all too many cases in the past, the real economic impact of direct federal spending programs has been limited to the planning and other jobs connected to the federal spending itself. This of course disappears, once the federal spending is gone. No long term viable economy results, certainly not one that can be self-sustaining.

Indian people have persistently urged the federal government to work with them to arrive at sensible solutions to their problems. In 1961, at a meeting of over 400 Indian tribal leaders, that request was summed up in this eloquent appeal:

"What we ask of America is not charity, not paternalism, even when benevolent. We ask only that the nature of our situation be recognized and made the basis of policy and action."

As we consider your proposals to alleviate the despair and poverty within our Nation's inner cities, we also ask that the nature of the tragic socioeconomic conditions that have existed for too long on Indian reservations be recognized and acted upon this year.

As you consider our request, we ask you to take to heart the following words of Peterson Zah, President of the Navajo Nation:

"Indeed, helping the American Indians to help themselves is neither a Democratic issue not a Republican issue; it's not a conservative policy or a liberal policy; it's not even a "special interest" issue. Rather, it is a "human" issue that must, and deserves to be, addressed from a national perspective on a bipartisan basis, with a real sense of urgency warranted by the deplorable conditions existing in Indian country—conditions which are truly a national disgrace."

Thank you for your consideration of our views. We look forward to working with you to strengthen and aid our Nation's inner cities and Indian reservations.

Sincerely,

DANIEL K. INOUYE,
Chairman.
JOHN MCCAIN,
Vice Chairman.

DEATH OF BROTHER GREGORY NUGENT, F.S.C.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, the passing of a saintly man deserves our acknowledgement; even as we worry and toil about so many megaissues, we need to reflect on what some other has made of his mortal toil in service to his people and his God.

My good friend, Myles Ambrose, has shared the requiem homily given a week ago by Father William Byron, S.J., president of The Catholic University of America in tribute to Brother Gregory Nugent, F.S.C. Its spirit and simple elegance reflect the man and invite our respect of his life among us.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of Father Byron's homily be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the homily was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE GOOD APPLE

The Texts: Job 19:23–27; Responsorial Psalm 103:8, 11, 13–14; Romans 5:17–21; Matthew 11:25–30.

The best summary description of the person and life of Brother Gregory Nugent is the simple assertion that he was a saint. I worked with him closely on a daily basis for ten years. I had breakfast with him every day. He was friend, counselor, helper, adviser, and assistant in any way, at any time, in any circumstance that provided an opening for his generous service. I knew him well. He was a saintly man.

"Come to me, all you who are weary and find life burdensome, and I will refresh you. Take my yoke upon your shoulders and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble of heart. Your souls will find rest, for my yoke is easy and my burden light."

The only portion of that comforting message, from Jesus to all of us, that does not apply to Brother Gregory, is the reference to finding life "burdensome." If he did, he never showed it; he was unfailingly cheerful, always concerned with easing the burdens of others, reluctant to the point of resistance when it came to having others lighten the load that happened to be his.

But he did indeed "learn from" Jesus. He understood what it meant to be "gentle and humble of heart." Nor did he misunderstand the meaning of the earlier and widely repeated translation of that phrase, "meek and humble of heart." He knew that meekness is not weakness; he knew that true humility is never timidity. He was a self-effacing man of compassionate courage. He was a saint.

I chose the second reading, the selection from the fifth chapter of Paul's Letter to the Romans, for inclusion in this liturgy in order to make a point that will help us to reflect on the unseen "value added" to our world through the presence in our midst of Brother Gregory. We have all been warned since childhood that "one bad apple can spoil the barrel." But we tend not to appreciate the potential for positive influence of one good apple. The point is one of profound theological significance. Saint Paul makes it well in his Letter to the Romans: "To sum up, then," writes Paul, "just as a single offense brought condemnation to all men [and women], a single righteous act brought all [of us] acquittal and life. Just as through one man's disobedience all became sinners, so through one man's obedience all shall become just."
